The Lives of Mentally Retarded People

Daryl Paul Evans, University of Kansas

What is it like to be mentally retarded in a society that places a high premium on competence? Though mentally retarded people are becoming more integral participants in our society than they once were, they still, in many respects, inhabit worlds of their own. This book examines those worlds, as well as the increasing role of retarded persons in mainstream society and the needs and problems this integration has produced. Dr. Evans explores the ways in which professionals, governments, communities, and families attempt to meet these needs and cope with the attendant problems. He also probes the special adaptations people make to being mentally handicapped and offers glimpses of their feelings, their fears, and their frustrations.

This book is the culmination of several years of observation in the field, extensive conversations with professionals, parents, and retarded people themselves, and an intensive examination of the literature on the subject. Addressing such practical issues as education, sexuality, law, and prevention, together with social attitudes toward them, it presents a cohesive view of what it means to be mentally retarded and invites professionals and students in the field of developmental disabilities, families of retarded people, and lay readers to share in a unique sociological perspective of mental retardation.
