Combating Terrorism in Central Asia: Explaining Differences in States’ Responses to Terror

Mariya Y. Omelicheva

Abstract:
This work examines differences in the level of violence of counterterrorism measures adopted by Central Asian states. Why do some Central Asian governments opt for wanton repression in the name of the struggle with terrorism, while others adopt less severe methods of control and prevention? To answer this question, the study draws on a synthesis of rationalist and constructivist explanations. Like rationalists, it posits that the magnitude of terrorism and states’ material capabilities affect the governments’ responses to terrorism. Following constructivists, the study stresses the impact of ideas about the nature of terrorist threat, and views on the appropriateness of the use of force on counterterrorism policies of Central Asian states.
Abstract

This work examines differences in the level of violence of counterterrorism measures adopted by Central Asian states. Why do some Central Asian governments opt for wanton repression in the name of the struggle with terrorism, while others adopt less severe methods of control and prevention? To answer this question, the study draws on a synthesis of rationalist and constructivist explanations. Like rationalists, it posits that the magnitude of terrorism and states’ material capabilities affect the governments’ responses to terrorism. Following constructivists, the study stresses the impact of ideas about the nature of terrorist threat, and views on the appropriateness of the use of force on counterterrorism policies of Central Asian states.

Governments challenged by the threat of terrorism respond to terrorist acts in different ways. Some states go to extremes to root out terrorism using widespread repression not only of terrorists but of innocent civilians as well, while others rely on less severe mechanisms of control and prevention. What explains this variation?

This inquiry focuses on the counterterrorism responses of Kazakhstan, the Kyrgyz republic, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. After the collapse of the USSR, political elites of these Central Asian states instituted openly non-democratic regimes variously labeled as ‘authoritarian presidentialism’, ‘neopatrimonial regimes’, or ‘personal dictatorships’.1 The differences in the extent of repression committed by these non-democratic states in the name of the struggle with terrorism constitute an interesting empirical puzzle.
To explain the puzzling differences in the level of repression used by the Central Asian governments in the context of struggle with terrorism, this study resorts to a combination of Rationalist and Constructivist explanations of state behavior. It posits that the incidents of political violence and terrorism in the region and states’ material capabilities are important, albeit, insufficient determinants of the states’ counterterrorism measures. Ideas about the nature of terrorist threat and appropriate responses to it also influence governments’ interpretations of political violence and subsequent reactions to it. The study examines historical and social contexts that gave rise to particular meanings of the terrorist threat in Central Asia and ideas about effective and acceptable responses to political violence.

The sample of the selected cases is well suited for systematic comparisons. One of the criticisms of small-n comparative designs is that they try to account for too many variables using too few cases, thus, producing findings that lack internal validity. If case studies isolate and test the impact of a few variables, they are criticized for not accounting for other ‘extraneous’ factors that may influence the outcome in question. The large-n studies control for those ‘extraneous’ effects statistically. This study ‘controls’ for confounds by selecting cases that evince many institutional and cultural similarities.

All Central Asian states share the history of domination by Tsarist and Soviet Russia. The outdated Communist-era political structures, predominance of political interests and ideology as defined by the central government, narrowly specialized dependent economies and inefficient systems of resource management are the legacies of the soviet regime. Currently, all Central Asian states are subject to geopolitical competition, continuing influence and intervention of their ‘past colonial and Soviet master, Russia’, and mounting challenges of Islamic fundamentalism. The majority of Central Asians belong to Hanafi Sunnism, the most tolerant and liberal school of thought of Sunni Islam. Being a Muslim in Central Asia is a part of the local identity. For many people it is defined by adherence to traditions and customs rather than strict observance of Islamic rituals.

The least visited and studied ex-Soviet Central Asian republics have recently caught attention of many world powers. The world cares about Central Asia for two reasons: the region’s phenomenal deposits of oil and natural gas and its frontline position in the global fight against terrorism and organized crime. The United States has energy security, strategic and commercial interests in the region. The US policy goals regarding Central Asian energy resources include the promotion of independence and stability of Central Asian states and their ties to the West, diversification of Western energy suppliers and encouragement of the construction of east-west pipelines that do not transit Iran. The ongoing instability in South and Southwest Asia and the war on terrorism necessitate an enduring US military presence in Central Asia. Interests in the energy resources and security of the region swept away any uncertainty about Central Asia’s importance to the US and international system.

This study is composed of four sections. The first section defines counterterrorism and details counterterrorism policies of the Central Asian states. The second section lays out theory-based explanations of differences in the level of violence of counterterrorism responses followed by evaluation of empirical evidence in five case studies. Section three discusses the findings of case studies and draws attention to the dynamic of interaction of brutal counterterrorism measures and instances of political violence in the region. The overview of the study is presented in the final part.

The primary sources of data for this analysis are states’ reports detailing their counterterrorism measures submitted to the Counter-Terrorism Committee (the CTC) of the United Nations, the annual country reports on human rights practices of the US Department of State, and reports of international human rights organizations – Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch. The information on illegally detained, prosecuted and executed individuals charged with the crime of terrorism contained in the reports has been verified through the analysis of news wires of the regional media using the Lexus-Nexus search engine and reports of the local human rights organizations (in Russian). Additionally, the legislative databases of Central Asian States were analyzed.

Counterterrorism Policies of the Central Asian States

Counterterrorism is a multifaceted policy aimed at prevention and combat of terrorism through a combination of political, legal, diplomatic and security measures. The analysts of counterterrorism typically characterize states as ‘soft’ or ‘hard-liners’, or classify counterterrorism programs into the ‘war’ or ‘criminal justice’ models. Common to these and similar typologies of counterterrorism is the idea that the degree of states’ deviation from the rule of law and internationally protected human rights under the pretext of fighting with terrorism varies across states.

The governments of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan adopted extensive counterterrorism programs and legislation to combat terrorism and religious extremism, criminalized terrorist activity and terrorism-related acts. They established counterterrorism institutions with almost identical functions and authority. The counterterrorism legislation of all Central Asian states reiterates principles of the rule of law and respect for human rights. Yet, all Central Asian governments went astray from the proclaimed standards. The extent of violation of human rights, liberties and prerogatives of law varies across the states of the region (see Table 1).

The government of Uzbekistan went to extremes to liquidate radical Islamic groups blamed for a series of terrorist attacks in the state. Uzbek authorities have persecuted, hunted down, assaulted and incarcerated Muslim fundamentalists. Gradually, the government’s repression has spread to moderate Islamic believers. Uzbek courts have handed down harsh punishments for terrorism-related acts as well as for less serious activities, such as the dissemination of materials intended to undermine public order. The courts’ rulings have been based on the flimsiest of evidence of the defendants’ guilt in the alleged crimes. Unfair trials, systematic torture and ill-treatment have become a routine in Uzbekistan. Reported disappearances, death sentences and executions have been a big concern of the international human rights groups. In the context of the ‘war on terrorism’, the government has been using war-like means to chase, crackdown on and eradicate Islamic militants. The scores of civilians perished as a result of excessive force used by the Uzbek security forces during the counterterrorism operations.
Table 1. Counterterrorism Policies of the Central Asian States

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Legislative Framework</th>
<th>Uzbekistan</th>
<th>Tajikistan</th>
<th>Turkmenistan</th>
<th>Kazakhstan</th>
<th>Kyrgyzstan</th>
</tr>
</thead> <tbody>
<tr>
<td>Institutions Responsible for Counter-terrorism</td>
<td>National Security Service; Ministries of Internal Affairs, Defense and Emergency Situations; and Committees on the Protection of State Border and Customs</td>
<td>Ministries of Security, Internal Affairs, Defense and Emergencies; Committee on the Protection of State Border; and Presidential Guard</td>
<td>Ministries of National Security, Internal Affairs and Defense; Security Service of the President; and State Border and Customs Services</td>
<td>National Security Committee; Ministries of Internal Affairs and Defense; Customs and Border Services; and Office of the Prosecutor-General</td>
<td>National Security Service; Security Council; Ministries of Internal Affairs and Defense; Customs and Border Services; and Office of the Prosecutor-General</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Courts’ Penalties for Terrorism and Related Acts</td>
<td>20-25 years of imprisonment or death penalty; 10-25 years for less serious acts</td>
<td>5-25 years of imprisonment or death penalty; 1-18 years for less serious crimes</td>
<td>5 years to life imprisonment</td>
<td>4-18 years of imprisonment; 2-5 years for less serious acts</td>
<td>10-25 years in prison or death penalty; a fine or up to 8 years in prison for less serious acts</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The government of Tajikistan has also been known for harsh prosecution of Islamic militants. During the course of a five-year Tajik civil war, the governmental troops used indiscriminate fire in military operations against Islamists. The 1997 peace agreement brought fighting to an end and ensured representation of the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP), which fought on the side of the opposition, in the governmental structures. However, the IRP’s activities have been hampered by a renewed persecution. Tajik officials launched criminal investigations against former fighters on the grounds of various grave crimes, including terrorist acts, allegedly committed during the civil war. The IRP maintains that trials and sentencing are politically motivated to discredit the party. Several years after the termination of fighting, the government continued using war-like means to liquidate the remnants of the armed militants whom the governments labeled ‘terrorists’, ‘bandits’ and ‘gangsters’. During the retaliatory attacks launched by the government forces in the summer 2001, dozens of locals lost their houses, livestock and lives. The members of radical Islamic groups have also been subjected to intense surveillance and prosecution. Local monitors and journalists allege that defendants charged with participation in or support of the activities of Hizb ut-Tahrir, an extremist Islamic political organization banned in the state, had unfair trials and were abused and tortured in detention to extort confessions.

Until recently, Turkmenistan lacked a distinct counterterrorism policy. The sweeping national security measures and stern political control compensated for the paucity of the specific counterterrorism measures. The President of Turkmenistan, Saparmurat Niyazov, has personified the state, state power, state unity and national legitimacy. Consequently, national security of the Republic has been tantamount to personal security of the President. To keep presidential powers intact, Niyazov’s regime has blatantly subdued political and religious opponents and placed bans on political pluralism, religious diversity or alternative expression. After an alleged assassination attempt on the President in November 2002, which Niyazov survived unhurt, the government adopted counterterrorism legislation and created the State Commission on Fighting Terrorism and the Department for Counterterrorism and Organized Crime of the Ministry of Internal Affair. Along with the legislative and institutional changes, state authorities intensified oppressive measures and prosecution of the Turkmen. By accounts of international human rights groups, the criminal police arrested, tortured and tried about 100 people in relation to the 2002 attack. All trials were closed to public and conducted with blatant violations of due process. Among those prosecuted were relatives of the exiled political opposition.

The government of Kazakhstan also declared religious extremism as one of the threats to national security of Kazakhstan, but chose a more balanced approach to stave off Islamic fundamentalism. It has combined coercion and subjugation of political freedoms with policies of cooption, control and assimilation of the Islamic forces and appeasement of the general public. In 2005, the Parliament of Kazakhstan toughened national religious legislation and adopted the law envisaging severe punishment for extremist activities and financial help to extremist and terrorist groups. Under the pretext of prevention of terrorism and religious extremism, the law enforcement authorities conducted inspections of religious organizations throughout the country and suspended a number of religious groups. In October of 2004, the Supreme Court of Kazakhstan issued a ruling in which it recognized Al-Qaeda, the East Turkistan Islamic Party, the Kurdish People’s Congress and the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan as terrorist organizations and prohibited them from any activity in the state. A half of a year later, another Kazakh court banned activities of Hizb ut-Tahrir pronouncing this group as an extremist organization. In everyday life, however, there have been few arrests of Hizb ut-Tahrir activists and little repression of religious activists.\(^{25}\) The legislation of Kazakhstan contains no provisions allowing convictions for the distribution of religious literature or following nontraditional Islamic practices.\(^{26}\)

In the early 1990s, the Kyrgyz republic served as an example of democratic development in post-Soviet Central Asia and was described as an ‘island of democracy’ in a region with corrupt and repressive political leaders.\(^{27}\) A ‘softer’, more tolerant and conciliatory response towards activities of Hizb ut-Tahrir used to set Kyrgyzstan apart from its more fierce neighbors. A spokesperson for the Interior Ministry of Kyrgyzstan, Joldoshbek Busurmankulov, explained a difference in the republics’ strategies:

I don't think that we will live 20 years without any Hizb ut-Tahrir, if we give them [members of Hizb ut-Tahrir] 30 or 40 years of imprisonment or arrest all of them. It will not happen. I think we may fight by alternative ways, different methods. We should prove their destructiveness. We should fight for the hearts and minds of the people.\(^{28}\)

The following example illustrates differences in the ways the Central Asian governments have responded to threats. At different times, the presidents of Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan were targets of assassination attempts. In Turkmenistan, the government responded with a wide-spread repression of alleged partakers of the November 2002 attack. The Turkmen authorities issued orders for the resettlement to remote desert regions all ‘unworthy persons’ living on the border with Uzbekistan. The government of Uzbekistan claimed that the bombings that exploded in Tashkent in February 1999 were an assassination attempt targeting President Karimov because the incident happened in front of a governmental building and at a time when Karimov was scheduled to arrive for a meeting of his cabinet.\textsuperscript{29} A surge of arrests and trials followed the bombings. As a remarkable contrast appears the decision of Kyrgyz President Askar Akayev to pardon six people convicted of plotting to kill him in 1999. The offenders were sentenced to 14 to 16 years in prison on charges of preparation for a terrorist attack on Akayev and with an attempt to overthrow the country’s constitutional system. First, a city court reduced the terms to four and six years on defenders’ appeal; and a year later, all were pardoned by the President.

A series of incursions by Islamic militants and hostage-taking incidents in 1999-2000 spread fears of radical Islamists in the republic. Poorly prepared to fight off the raids of the guerilla force at the time of attacks, the government of Kyrgyzstan undertook a reform of the security forces and enhanced security measures in the aftermath of incursions. It also intensified and hardened its policies toward terrorism and religious extremism. Since 1999, active intelligence and counterintelligence efforts of Kyrgyzstan have been focused on the IMU, a militant Islamist group active in Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and elsewhere in Central Asia. The government of Kyrgyzstan has also undertaken active steps to halt the spread of religious groups’ literature and to track down members of the Hizb ut-Tahrir.\textsuperscript{30} In April 2004, Kyrgyzstan added Hizb ut-Tahrir to the list of banned religious extremist groups. Although, the followers of Hizb ut-Tahrir have not been implicated in violence in Kyrgyzstan, the government accuses the organization in ‘ideological terrorism’, and hampers activities of human rights groups, which speak out against the persecution of Hizb ut-Tahrir members.\(^{31}\)

The strategy of repression and violent crackdown has been systematically applied to suspected terrorists and their affiliates in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, and much less so in Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. Turkmenistan’s leadership has been using repressive means indiscriminately to suppress any opposition to the power of President. What can explain variation in counterterrorism responses of the Central Asian states?

Explaining Differences in Counterterrorism Responses of Central Asian States: Theory and Case Studies

The current state of the literature on states’ responses to terrorism is characterized by the lack of cross-sectional and longitudinal analyses of state violence in the name of the struggle with terrorism and scarcity of explanations of states’ counterterrorism policies. Few empirical analyses attempted to account for states’ choices of different counterterrorism measures, and those that did relied on a narrow sample of liberal democracies.\(^{32}\)

More general explanations of states’ behavior can be inferred from two competing analytical paradigms, namely Rationalism and Constructivism.\(^{33}\) Rationalist theories typically explain policy choices by reference to goal-seeking behavior. A state adopts a policy if the costs associated with enacting it do not exceed the expected benefits from its implementation.\(^{34}\) Constructivists refute the central tenet of rationalist approaches that states pursue their exogenously determined interests according to the ‘logic of expected consequences.’\(^{35}\) Instead, in their explanations of states’ policy choices constructivists assume that states act as social actors whose interests and identities are shaped by commonly held ("intersubjective") ideas (norms, knowledge, culture, etc.).

A widely held belief associating states’ responses to terrorism with the intensity of terrorist attacks and states’ capabilities to strike back is informed by the Rationalist conception of politics. The governments do what is believed in their best interest to do (i.e., to eliminate or minimize the threat of terrorism) given the availability of resources.

Constructivists note that states’ interests cannot be taken out of an ideational context that gives them their meanings. What constitutes an interest or a threat can never be stated a priori; ‘it should be approached as a social construction and theorized at that level’. For constructivists, states’ interests in fighting terrorism and choices of counterterrorism policies are defined by social norms and ideas about the nature of terrorist threat, and appropriate and legitimate responses to it.

The problems and shortcomings of Rationalism and Constructivism have been extensively discussed in the literature and need not be repeated here. The corollary of the criticisms is that none of the perspectives can provide a full and adequate explanation of states’ responses to terrorism, and their combination might be more productive. This study utilizes the tools of both approaches for providing a comprehensive account of the Central Asian states’ counterterrorism policies. A synthesis of rationalist and constructivist perspectives is feasible when Rationalism and Constructivism are treated pragmatically as analytical tools or ‘styles of thought’ to guide through the analysis of state policies.

Like Rationalists, this study posits that the magnitude of terrorist attacks will affect states’ security measures. The size of states’ material capabilities – security forces, financial resources, etc. - will limit the range of their policy options. Given the availability of resources, the intensity of states’ responses to terrorism should be positively related to the number and deadliness of terrorist attacks.

Following constructivists, this paper assumes that the facts of political life do not reflect an objective reality, but depend on interpretations of actors experiencing them. The acts of political violence, for example, will be imbued with particular meanings depending on a common understanding of what constitutes a threat. The extent of application of a state’s capabilities will be bound by a general understanding of appropriateness and acceptability of the use force. The meanings and knowledge, themselves, are highly malleable products of historical and social processes.40

Due to historical circumstances, the governments of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan came to believe that the threat of terrorism stems from activities of radical Islamic groups. Their views on the extent of threat posed by radical Islam have varied depending on the circumstances of introduction and practice of Islam in the societies of Central Asia. The difference exists between those ethnic groups whose nucleus was formed by settled populations and those who had recently been nomads.41 Islam has played a more superficial and varied role on the territories of Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan formally inhabited by nomads. The sedentary people of what is now Uzbekistan and Tajikistan adopted Islam as their main religion much earlier and have observed Islamic prohibitions and laws more closely. The differences in the way the settled and itinerant populations practiced Islam translated in the varied role of religion among the contemporary republics of Central Asia. Uzbekistan and Tajikistan have experienced greater Islamicisation than Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, where traditionally less strict adherence to orthopraxis and orthodoxy of Islam prevented it from taking deep roots. The latter factor has affected the Central Asian governments’ views on the extent of threat posed by radical Islam.

Furthermore, constructivists consider states as social actors whose actions express collective as well as individual intentionality. The various organizations and institutions to which states belong affect their understanding of problems and their choices of policy options. It can be expected, then, that ideas about the acceptability of the use of force and expectations of other states conveyed in the language of international norms and diplomatic statements will also influence counterterrorism policies of the Central Asian republics.

To summarize, deciding on measures to combat terrorism, the governments will be driven by their interest in minimizing threats to state security and constrained by the availability of resources. The governments’ interpretations of the threat will be shaped by ideas about who terrorists are and how much threat they pose. In Central Asia, the understanding of the nature of terrorist threat evolved under the impact of knowledge about the role of Islamic faith in the societies of Central Asia. Furthermore, views on the use of force held by the Central Asian leaders and promoted in the international discourse and norms will affect the governments’ choices of measures to combat terrorism.

Uzbekistan

On 16 February 1999 six car bombs exploded in the downtown of the Uzbek capital killing 16 people and injuring more than 120 others. Such an attack was unprecedented in the history of independent Uzbekistan. The official authorities contended that the members of the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan (IMU) orchestrated the blasts. The IMU is a militant Islamic organization designated as a terrorist group by a number of states. Its original aim was to establish an Islamic state in Uzbekistan in opposition to President Karimov’s secular regime. Later, the IMU expanded its goals and activities in an attempt to create a region-wide Islamic caliphate beginning in Uzbekistan and gradually extending into the rest of Central Asia.

The activities of radical Islamic groups have always alarmed the Uzbek government. It is believed that Uzbekistan with its deep Islamic tradition provides fertile ground for cultivation of fundamentalism. The settled population that formed the Uzbek ethnos converted to Islam in the 8th century. During the 10th and 12th centuries, Samarkand, Bukhara, and other urban centers, mostly in present day Uzbekistan, were the cradle of Islamic renaissance in Central Asia. Since then, Islam has become an indispensable part of traditions, practices and social structures of the Uzbeks.

After independence, the revival of Islamic religion in Uzbekistan represented an expression of interest in a foundational component of the ‘national heritage’ of Uzbeks. President Karimov attempted to harness religious sentiments to endorse legitimacy and ensure public support of his rule. Public authorities have been creating and cultivating national ideology encompassing elements of Islamic religious doctrine, albeit an official interpretation of it. Some devout Muslims in Uzbekistan, the so-called Wahhabis, openly opposed Islamic rituals based on the officially permitted interpretations. The more radical Islamic groups supported by Saudi, Iranian, Pakistani and Afghan Islamists, sought to establish an Islamic state governed by Islamic law.

President Karimov has often expressed fears of this radical strain of Islam. He believes that radical Islamists and fundamentalists threaten to destabilize the state and undermine confidence in the state reformer. In the early 1990s, the government cracked down on leaders of radical Islamic groups, which openly criticized official Muslim administration or did not demonstrate explicit loyalty to the state. The February 1999 explosions exacerbated the government’s fears of the threat of Islamism and provoked massive retaliation against people practicing Islam outside the state-run religious institutions.

Since then, the government has routinely accused Islamists, particularly the members of the IMU and Hizb ut-Hahrir, in all incidents of political violence in Uzbekistan. Even the Andijan uprising of 13 May 2005 was blamed on Islamic ‘terrorists’ and ‘fanatics’ who sought to create disturbances in the region, topple the government and establish an Islamic state.

The Uzbek authorities possess all necessary resources for launching a massive crack down on Islamic ‘enemies’ of the state. Uzbekistan has the largest population in the region, significant natural resources, strongest military power among the five Central Asian states, and sufficient police force. The government’s beliefs about the acceptability of the use of force allowed law enforcement officials to put the state’s capabilities in action. President Karimov was quoted as saying that the strong executive power is necessary during certain periods of a state’s development. He has explicitly referred to the experiences of a powerful Central Asian ruler of late 14th century, Amir Timur (Tamerlane). Timur’s reign promoted the consolidation of Islam in the Central Asian region and Islam, in turn, was the basis on which Timur united his state. President Karimov, too, has been using official Islam for consolidating and legitimizing his power, when necessary by forceful and oppressive means.
The relations of the Uzbek authorities with governments of other states have strengthened the conception of radical Islam as the main threat to national security and political stability of Uzbekistan. The civil war in Tajikistan reinforced the Uzbek government’s view on ‘the dangers of the power-sharing alliance’ with Islamic fundamentalist groups, which the Uzbek authorities blamed for the war in Tajikistan. ‘We would not want a repeat of the chaos which exists in Tajikistan,’ stated Karimov. He banned the creation of Islamic political parties and tightened up state security measures against Islamists.

The 9/11 attacks drew terrorism into a sharp focus of international community. The Security Council resolution 1373 (2001) outlined various counterterrorism measures that are binding on states under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. This landmark document for the first time created uniform obligations for all members of the United Nations. A notable fact is that, while obliging states to adopt extensive counterterrorism measures, the resolution does not define terrorism. In compliance with international counterterrorism norms and resolutions of the Security Council, all Central Asian republics toughened domestic criminal legislation and fortified counterterrorism measures that included the strengthening of domestic regulations of religious and political freedoms.

The relations of the Central Asian governments with the United States were an important factor in the formulation and implementation of counterterrorism policies in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. The designation of the IMU as a terrorist organization and a branch of Al-Qaeda by the US Department of State reinforced the determination of the Uzbek leaders, as well as the Tajik and Kyrgyz governments, in apprehending and liquidating members and supporters of this militant organization. Following the decision of Uzbekistan to lend its Khanabad military air base for staging military and logistic operations of American troops in the Afghan campaign, the government of the US rewarded Uzbekistan with sharply increased military and economic aid.\textsuperscript{59}

American assistance to Uzbekistan has been conditioned by ‘substantial and continuing’ progress in the areas of human rights and the promotion of democracy. Many observers believed that until the events surrounding the Andijan apprising of May 2005 the US had not fully utilized its leverage to influence human rights practices of Karimov’s government.\textsuperscript{60} After the US government introduced economic and political sanctions against the Tashkent authorities in 2005, and even threatened to institute proceedings against Karimov in the International Court following the brutal suppression of public unrest in Andijan, Uzbekistan ordered the US to leave the Khanabad military base. The NATO allies, too, were prohibited from using the Uzbek territory and airspace for their operations in Afghanistan.\textsuperscript{61} International media outlets and foreign non-governmental organizations were ordered to discontinue their activities and to leave Uzbekistan.

\textit{Tajikistan}

Tajikistan has probably taken the brunt of political violence, religious extremism and terrorism in the region. By different estimates from 60,000 to 100,000 people perished in the Tajik civil war (1992-97). Much of the conflict stemmed from the aggravated regional differences and fights over resources. Yet, the dispute over the role of Islam in state-building contributed to the outbreak of fighting.\textsuperscript{62} The hostage-taking, assassinations and other crimes committed by the renegade fighters, who refused to disarm under the terms of the 1997 peace treaty exacerbated the government’s fears of radical Islam. Following the lead of the government of Uzbekistan, Tajik authorities began using the label of ‘terrorist’ in reference to remaining antigovernment armed groups. The threat of terrorism has also been invoked in reference to activities of an official Islamist party, the Islamic Renaissance Party of Tajikistan.63

The government’s views on the extent of threat posed by Islamists have been shaped by an understanding of a significant role that Islam has played in the lives of Tajik citizens. Islam has become a substantial and organic part of the culture and history of the Tajik people since its introduction in the second half of the 7th century. During the years of perestroika, the radical Islamists, who existed in small numbers on the territory of the Tajik Soviet Republic (as well as in other parts of the USSR), were able to traverse the path from small informal groupings to mass meetings, and the creation of Islamic political organizations.64 The prevalence of Islamic values in the minds and hearts of the Tajiks was an important factor contributing to this swift transformation.

The fear of the popularity of Islam among the Tajiks prompted the sharp government’s opposition to the creation of the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP) in 1990,65 notwithstanding its very moderate political platform.66 Supported by the official Tajik clergy, the IRP received official registration in November 1991. However, the government took all necessary measures to prevent a candidate nominated by the opposition bloc uniting democrats and Islamists to win the 1991 presidential elections.67

The 1997 peace agreement ended the war and legalized the IRP banned in 1993 at the onset of fighting. It also formalized a 30 per cent quota of positions in the executive branch to the United Tajik Opposition (UTO), an umbrella group led by the IRP.68 However, the IRP members received posts mostly at lower ranks and well below the established quota. The number of IRP representatives in the government structures dropped further after the law enforcement officers began prosecuting former members of the UTO.⁶⁹

The Tajik government continues to view Islamism as one of the main threats to national security despite the all time low public support for the IRP and radical Islamic groups that are believed to be responsible for fomenting violence in the country. Although the IRP has adopted a somewhat conformist position with regard to the government, the latter repeatedly accuses the party in the propaganda of ‘extremism’.⁷⁰

The recent history of bloody war has had an impact on the Tajik government’s responses to the threat of terrorism and religious extremism. It is well known that governments tend to use past decisions as a base-line for current policy choices.⁷¹ The peace agreement of 1997 brought the de jure end to the civil war; yet, the government of Tajikistan continued to rely on war-like tactics for fending off security risks to the state. The government has prolonged its military operations against the rebel fighters and has been known for using indiscriminate fire killing and injuring civilians. The government-led military units and law enforcement agencies have been reported extorting, kidnapping, beating, torturing, looting and inflicting wanton violence against civilians.⁷²

The policies of other states have also affected counterterrorism measures of Tajikistan. The Tajik security officials and local human rights activists tend to agree that pressure from the Uzbek government on President Emamoli Rakhmonov has led to harsher responses to fundamentalism in the republic. As one of the security officers put it, ‘If Rakhmonov doesn’t clamp down on Hizb ut-Tahrir, what will Karimov say to him?’⁷³ Some regional specialists maintain that Uzbekistan in collaboration with the government of Russia contributed to the start of war in 1992 in order to ‘demonstrate the seriousness of the threat of Islamic extremism’ in the region.\textsuperscript{74}

In the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, Tajikistan declared itself a stalwart supporter of the international coalition for the fight against terrorism. It intensified effort at combating religious extremism and terrorism. Some observers claim that the government of Tajikistan has been using the ‘war on terrorism’ as a pretext for settling scores with former civil war opponents.\textsuperscript{75} Following the lead of other Central Asian states, Tajikistan announced that Hizb ut-Tahir have had contacts with Al-Qaeda and the Taliban and declared the group as a major security threat in 2002.\textsuperscript{76}

\textit{Turkmenistan}

During the first decade of independence, Turkmenistan experienced stable, albeit, politically repressive existence. It ended unexpectedly 25 November 2002, when a gunman fired at a motorcade carrying Turkmen President Niyazov, killing his cortege and wounding President’s escort. The leadership of Turkmenistan believes that this only ‘terrorist’ attack carried out in the state was masterminded abroad by former high-ranking governmental officials who had left the country since 1999 and established a new opposition group, the National-Democratic Movement of Turkmenistan.\textsuperscript{77}

Radical Islam failed to emerge as a significant opposition force to the leadership of Saparmurat Niyazov who eliminated all groups contesting his power during the early years of Turkmenistan’s independence. The government deported religious activists who were not citizens of Turkmenistan. It strengthened regulations of Islamic religion and practices by introducing censorship of religious printed and audio-production, and establishing strict police surveillance over the department of theology at Ashgabad University, the only institution allowed to teach Islamic studies. The Shiite community was also denied registration.\textsuperscript{78} Today, Islam remains under strict governmental control and non-traditional religions are blatantly suppressed.

The harsh means of social control might have obstructed activities of radical Islamic groups in Turkmenistan. However, the suppression of religious and political freedoms does not provide a complete explanation as to why Islamists have been unable to find inroads to the Turkmen society. The repressive policies of neighboring states have failed to prevent the spread of radical Islam. There are particular features of Islam in Turkmenistan that mitigated the possibility of developing the radical forms of Islam on the Turkmen soil. Islam was assimilated into the tribal culture of the Turkmen through the activities of the Sufi saints (the so-called ‘shaykhs’) rather than through the ‘high’ written Islamic tradition and institutions of sedentary culture. The Turkmen clannish and tribal social structures conditioned the impact of Islamic beliefs imported by Sufi missionaries. The centuries old loyalties toward the nomadic tribes have softened the impact of Islam in Turkmenistan. The modern Turkmen continue to identify more with their tribal culture than religion or nationality. The religious and social systems of the Turkmen society have preserved the tribal and ethnic loyalties, which, in turn, have effectively diluted the impact of radical Islam.\textsuperscript{79}

These factors explain the Turkmen’s general passivity toward Niyazov’s peculiar adoption and adaptation of Islamic faith to his own ends. The president himself has assumed the role of a leader of Muslim people and created his own pseudo-religion glorifying his personality. He prepared a religious text, the Rukhnam, which is cited in mosques and religious schools along with passages from the Quran.\textsuperscript{80} legalized religious observation and permitted functioning of religious schools in the officially secular state.

The status of a neutral state helps Turkmenistan avoid entering undesirable treaties and alliances, thus protecting it from interferences of Western states. The government of Niyazov has been fond of its ties with authoritarian China and Iran, which similarly deplore Western practices of intervention on human rights matters. The policy of non-involvement into the internal affairs of the small and inaccessible republic has contributed to the strengthening of power by President Niyazov. Niyazov has not been concerned with serious consequences from American government, which is interested in natural gas and oil that it does not want to transport through Iran. The international community has had little interest in the state that does not threaten security of its neighbors and reveals no attempts at enforcing its political style abroad.81

Kazakhstan

Kazakhstan has never been attacked by Islamic militants, nor had it suffered from deadly terrorist violence. On 22 April 2002, the Kazakh security forces detonated a bomb hidden on the side of a road used by President Nazarbayev, thus preventing the only terrorist attacked deemed to have targeted the government. Another explosion that occurred in November 2004 near the office of Kazakhstan’s ruling party, injured one passer-by. The Kazakh officials downplayed the incident.82

Untouched by political instability inspired by Islamists, the Kazakh authorities have never regarded radical Islam as the principle threat to national security. Yet, the government of Kazakhstan considers Islamic fundamentalism as a destabilizing factors in the region. The Kazakh officials and experts also believe that constraints on ‘using’ Islam are much stronger in Kazakhstan than in any other Central Asian state. In 1994, some 47 per cent of the population of Kazakhstan was Muslim, 44 per cent was Russian Orthodox and 2 per cent was Protestant. The relatively small Muslim population rendered insufficient social basis for mobilization by Islamic groups. The majority of those identifying with Islamic creed are rather light observers of Islamic prohibitions and laws. Although, Islam spread in the lands of nomadic tribes in 9-10th century, it has never had such a prevailing influence among the Kazakh nomads as among the Uzbeks and Tajiks.

Furthermore, Kazakhstan has a big Russian population, which constitutes a strong bloc of support for President Nazarbayev. Nazarbayev has been reluctant to identify his state too closely with Islamic causes, presenting his nation as a bridge between the Islamic East and the Christian West.

In the wake of the September 11th terrorist attacks, the rhetoric of Islamic danger has become very common. It led the Kazakh government to reassess the potential of radical Islam to disrupt the country’s stability. There have been reports of the rise of support for Hizb ut-Tahrir in the south of the country, and some Kazakh officials expressed fears of Islamists. The suicide bombings that exploded in the capital of Uzbekistan in July 2004 caused security concerns to soar in Kazakhstan. Following the general crackdown on Islam in the region, Kazakh authorities beefed up prosecution of religious extremist groups.

As the wealthiest and the most economically advanced nation of the region, Kazakhstan has all necessary resources to crackdown on the leading critics of opposition and to stifle any manifestation of radical Islam. Kazakhstan, as well as other Central Asian states, received significant military assistance from the US, which allowed the Kazakh government to upgrade its arms arsenals, enhance military training programs and to acquire equipment to prevent and respond to terrorist incidents.

Constraints on the ‘use’ of dictatorial power have also been much higher in Kazakhstan than in the neighboring states. The business elite represent a strong opposition block to Nazarbayev’s government. Kazakhstan, as well as Kyrgyzstan, has relatively advanced civil society. President Nazarbayev himself understands that, without necessary political institutions, his government would be unable to attract foreign investments and sell Kazakhstan’s natural reaches in the world markets. Furthermore, Nazarbayev asserts that his principles of governance reflect values of the society he rules. One of the often-stated values of the Kazakh people is their openness and tolerance. The Kazakhs often stress that their nomadic past has contributed to the greater receptiveness of external influences and adaptability of their culture. It can be surmised that these values of openness and tolerance also had bearing on the government’s policy choices.

Kyrgyzstan

A former member of the IMU once alleged that Kyrgyzstan ‘has the most favorable conditions to carry out terrorist attacks’. Indeed, the majority of terrorist acts and Islamic incursions took place on the territory of Kyrgyzstan and its neighbor, Tajikistan. Yet, until recently, the Kyrgyz government avoided making a serious crackdown on individuals and groups suspected of posing a threat to state security. It is possible that Kyrgyzstan has lacked capabilities for carrying out mass arrests of terrorist suspects or raiding communities suspected of harboring Islamic fighters. For instance, at a time of the IMU incursion in Kyrgyzstan in the summer of 1999, the Kyrgyz army was in no condition to undertake a protracted campaign in the mountains. Until 1999, the state authorities had given little thought to having a military at all, because Russian border guards were protecting the Kyrgyz border. As the economic conditions in the country worsened and the national budget shrank, the military and police forces received even less attention.

On the other hand, Islam has always played a greater role in social and political life of the sedentary Uzbek and Tajik Muslims than in the politics and communities of the Kyrgyz. The ancient Kyrgyz society was based on a nomadic lifestyle and the Kyrgyz carried on many traditional tribal beliefs after their nominal conversion. In Kyrgyzstan, as in Kazakhstan, Islam has had cultural significance but little apparent impact on everyday life of most ethnic Kyrgyz, although there has been considerable regional variation. The religious opposition in Kyrgyzstan was less politicized, and had a narrower social base. Consequently, the government of Kyrgyzstan viewed it as a minor threat to state security. In an interview to a Russian newspaper, President Akaev put it straightforward, ‘If I don’t have a real problem of religious extremism, why would I create an artificial one?’

The 1999 raids of Islamic militants did not change the Kyrgyz government’s views on the influence of Islam within the country. The state authorities believed that terrorist threat originated from outside of the country. A quasi-official public position on the nature of terrorist threat that came through in the conversations with Kyrgyz officials was that terrorism had been inspired by an unnamed ‘black force’ coming from ‘outside’. The perception of terrorism as an international threat, as well as limited national capabilities, led Kyrgyzstan to seek international help and active collaboration with different states and international organizations; which include the UN, the OSCE, the Shanghai Cooperation organization, and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) among others.
Explaining their attitudes and responses to religious fundamentalism, the Kyrgyz leadership often appealed to tolerance as an intrinsic trait of the Kyrgyz character. Askar Akaev, who had ruled the country until April 2005, declared that the principle of the non-use of force against the Kyrgyz people was an essential part of his political credo. In response to the Kyrgyz Procurator General who insisted on the ineffectiveness of light penalties given to those propagating extremist views, President Akaev asserted, ‘only ideas should be used to defeat ideas, not repression.’ Under President Akaev, the Kyrgyz Parliament never amended the Kyrgyz penal code with harsher penalties for activities involving religious extremism.

The new government of President Bakiev has demonstrated a more resolute approach toward Islamists in the country. The first law signed by the new president was on counteracting extremist activity. The stretched definition of extremism provided in the law allows prosecuting activists of Hizb ut-Tahrir and other Islamic groups operating in the country for extremism.

According to experts, the Chinese and Uzbek authorities pressed the Kyrgyz government to adopt anti-extremist legislation. The government of China has long been interested in establishing in Kyrgyzstan legal basis for prosecuting the Uighurs. The latter are a Turkic-speaking people residing in the northwestern region of China, the majority of whom profess Islam. For years, the Chinese authorities have been battling the Uighur separatist movement. The government of China has been exerting strong influence over the Central Asian states in dealing with Uighurs. Bowing to pressure from China, the government of Kyrgyzstan suppressed any support to the Uighurs. In a series of trials, which observers labeled as politically motivated, the Kyrgyz courts sentenced Uighur defendants for terrorist bombings and attempts to set up a branch of the Uighur separatist movement in Kyrgyzstan.

Uzbekistan has long been a fervent critic of Kyrgyzstan’s lenient approach to Islamism. On 12 April 2002, the governments of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan signed an agreement on joint action to fight terrorism, as well as political and religious extremism. This agreement laid juridical grounds to demand from the Kyrgyz government that it takes decisive steps for preventing the recruitment of individuals for terrorist activities in other states. The Kyrgyz courts outlawed activities of religious organizations banned in Uzbekistan. The Kyrgyz government has not blocked the Uzbek secret service’s activities in the country, including occasional abductions and forced repatriation of Islamic activists. The liquidation of a prominent ethnic Uzbek religious leader, R.O. Kamoluddin, in a joint raid of the Uzbek-Kyrgyz security forces on 6 August 2006 became an apex of anti-terrorism cooperation of Kyrgyzstan with Uzbekistan.

Discussion

Authoritarianism is a long-standing Central Asian tradition that has been preserved in all states in the region after their independence. Within this authoritarian context, the Central Asian governments chose different responses to terrorism associated with activities of radical Islamic groups in the region. Uzbekistan has applied the most repressive counterterrorism measures targeting Islamic activists. Similarly, Tajikistan took a very tough stance against radical Islamists. In Turkmenistan, President Niyazov has tightened his grip over both religious and political activities. Both Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan have utilized less repressive counterterrorism policies.
An untested assumption favored in the academic, political, and media circles is that states’ responses to terrorism match the intensity of terrorist attacks and material capabilities of states. Neither Turkmenistan, nor Kazakhstan suffered from deadly terrorist violence; yet, the governments of both states endorsed vigorous counterterrorism measures. Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan have taken the brunt of terrorism and Islamic incursions in the region. However, it is Uzbekistan that has systematically applied the most appalling methods of combating terrorism. The counterterrorism responses of the richest states of the region, Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, and those of the poorest nations, Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan, differ as well.

To explain the puzzling differences in states’ responses to terrorism, this study relied on a synthesis of Rationalist and Constructivist explanations of state behavior. It posited that the intensity of terrorist attacks, as well as states’ capabilities to combat terrorism, would affect the brutality of states’ counterterrorism policies. It also assumed that governments’ interpretations and reactions to terrorist acts would always be context-dependent; that is, domestic and international ideational contexts would provide a frame of reference for states’ interpretations of and reactions to political acts.

The evidence examined in the case studies largely supports the stated propositions. The terrorist attacks and Islamists’ incursions demonstrated that terrorist groups, like the IMU, operate out of the region and pose a threat to the stability of Central Asia. The incidents of terrorism and armed clashes with Islamic fighters sparked off retaliatory responses by the governments of Central Asian states.

Nonetheless, the mere facts of Islamists’ attacks and the damage inflicted by terrorist violence are insufficient for gauging the extent of a threat of radical Islam in Central Asia. Recently, in all Central Asian republics, radical and militant Islam has been in retreat. The toppling of the Taliban regime and the destruction of Al-Qaeda strongholds in Afghanistan severely weakened the IMU. Other radical groups, like Hizb ut-Hahrir, have enjoyed insignificant public support. Radical ideas about the establishment of an Islamic state have been alien to the majority of Central Asians. Islamism and religious fundamentalism have become associated with the threat of civil war and instability. Many people in Central Asia, even in the traditional centers of Islamic piety, have developed distrust and hostility toward radical Islamic groups. The threat of resurgence of the militant movement and the radicalization of the population continues to exist. However, there are good reasons, which are corroborated in field studies, to assume that radical Islamic groups have limited capabilities in the region.

In spite of this, the Central Asian officials, particularly those in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, claim that the IMU still poses a major threat to their countries and that support for radical Islamic groups has been on the rise across the region. To understand the views of the Central Asian governments on the extent of threat of Islamism, this study examined historical and social circumstances of introduction and the practice of Islam by Central Asian societies.

Islam is a religion of settled people, as it requires a developed urban infrastructure for institutionalized Muslim practices. Naturally, the wide steppes populated with itinerant tribes provided poor soil for Islam, and the nomadic culture was much more difficult to convert. Islam has had a less profound influence on the culture and politics of the descendants of nomads living in the steppes of Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan than on the social and political life of the sedentary Uzbek and Tajik Muslims. The governments of Uzbekistan and Tajikistan have always viewed radical Islam as a greater challenge to their secular regimes than the public authorities of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Turkmenistan. The Uzbek and Tajik officials feared that radical Islamic groups were capable of gaining enough public support to imperil the governing regimes, absent a massive government crackdown.

Also, in Uzbekistan, the belief about the effectiveness and inevitability of tough measures at certain stages of national development affected the government’s choices of repressive counterterrorism policies. In Tajikistan, a heavy hand of the history of violence directed the government to violent counterterrorism responses after the end of the Tajik civil war. In contrast, the leaders of Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan have invoked the values of tolerance and openness, which the Kazakh and Kyrgyz societies traced to their nomadic past, to explain their more accommodating approach to radical Islamic groups.

The contacts of Central Asian states with each other, as well as with other states of the world, have influenced their governments’ views on the problem of terrorism in the region. Bowing to political pressure from more powerful neighbors, all Central Asian governments strengthened their measures against terrorists, religious extremists and Islamists. Influenced by the government of President Karimov, the Kyrgyz authorities significantly increased security measures against the followers of Hizb ut-Tahrir who have sought refuge in Kyrgyzstan. The Tajik officials stepped up prosecution of the former UTO fighters and, under political pressure from China, all Central Asian republics intensified oppressive measures against the Uighur minority. Moscow also exploited the fears of religions extremism and terrorism in the region to revitalize the CIS collective security system, to bolster its ties with the Central Asian states in the military sphere and to fight Islamic extremists. Cooperation of the Central Asian governments with Russia, China and the US attracted significant material rewards and enhanced the status of the region in world politics.

The influence of the other states cannot be understood apart from discourse and the social norms that enabled possibilities for certain types of responses to terrorism. The speeches and statements of regional and world leaders, news reports and scholarly publications have repeatedly stressed the danger arising from activities of Islamists in Central Asia. Particularly after the 9/11 attacks and the inception of the global ‘war on terror’, the mentioning of the growth of Islamic sentiments has been accompanied by the rhetoric of threat and danger. The governments of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan got caught in the discourse of the ‘war on terror’, and were keen to demonstrate both their support of the global anti-terrorism coalition and their ability to cope with the new threat. Even the leaders of Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan began to treat all forms of political and social activity within Islam as manifestations of Islamic fundamentalism and a prelude to religious and political conflicts.

There is little doubt that all Central Asian governments have taken advantage of the novel context for their own interests: to put increasing pressure on democratic and religious opposition and to fortify power of the governing regimes. In much of this, the international community has been passively complicit. Only international human rights organizations put forward scathing criticism of the Central Asian governments’ increasingly authoritarian styles. The governing elites, conscious of the strategic importance of their states, have exploited the context of the global ‘war on terrorism’, as well as the fear of Islamic extremism, to justify and intensify their suppression of dissent, without much concern about international condemnation.\textsuperscript{109} With their increasingly close relationships to the US and heightened international profile, all governments appeared confident that derogations of human rights within their borders would have no diplomatic consequences.

An important pattern in the escalation of radical Islamic threat emerged from the analysis of case studies. The broad radicalization of Islamic groups seeking to challenge the secular nature of the newly independent states was a response to the persecution and reprisals inflicted upon the early manifestation of political Islam by the governments of some Central Asian states. The iron-hand policies toward radical Islamic groups provoked a reciprocation of violence and the appearance of militant terrorist groups in the region.

The state leadership of Uzbekistan launched a full-fledged attack on the independent religious opposition in 1993. It initiated a series of mass arrests of independent clergy, set restrictions on independent Muslim practices and staged ‘disappearances’ of influential Islamic leaders. A series of assassinations of public officials that took place in the Uzbekistan sector of the Ferghana Valley in December 1997 was a reprisal for disappearances of a number of respected imams. The state repression that followed the assassinations prompted the creation of the IMU. Those Islamists who escaped the 1992 crackdown on the radical Islamic groups became the leaders of the IMU.

The radicalization of Islamic movements on the eve of Tajik civil war was a consequence of the unwillingness of the Tajik authorities to integrate religious leaders into secularized institutions of the government.\textsuperscript{110} The sluggish and partial implementation of the provisions of the 1997 peace agreement provided a continuing \textit{raison d’etre} for the armed gangs formed by the former UTO’s fighters.
An upsurge in the mass repression in Uzbekistan generated the exodus of Islamists into the neighboring republics. The intensification of suppression of religious and political opponents in those states then increased the popularity of extremist ideologies and groups. On the background of worsening economic conditions and plummeting legitimacy of the governing elites, those who were persecuted and repressed by the authorities enjoyed the greatest popularity among the peoples of Central Asia.111

The observed pattern of the escalation of religious dissent, which was a response to indiscriminate retaliatory responses, is largely consistent with the literature on the impact of state repression on public dissent. Rational choice approaches assume that state repression significantly increases costs for achieving dissidents’ goals.112 If a state responds with repression to violent behavior, it will prompt the dissidents to abandon violence. If the state represses non-violent dissent, the dissidents will escalate their behavior to violent forms of protest. Additionally, research has demonstrated that state repression may have an immediate deterrent effect. However, in the long run, it will generate a lagged stimulus for a new protest activity.113 The repression of radical, non-violent groups, like Hizb ut-Tahrir, and the prosecution of moderate Muslims practicing their faith outside of religious confines established by the Central Asian governments have been associated with the lagged escalation of violent behavior in the Central Asian region.

To avoid future instability, growth of extremist groups and radicalization of the population, all Central Asian states need to re-examine their policies towards Islam. The governments have to introduce changes to their counterterrorism strategies, placing less emphasis on indiscriminate repression and retaliatory violent methods.114 The implications of indiscriminate violence and the suppression of religious and political freedoms are steep. Violence creates violence. It raises doubts about the legitimacy of fighting terrorism as a global objective and turns people away from the democratic values championed by the leaders of the global anti-terrorism coalition.

Conclusion

The governments of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan have been determined to eliminate the threat of terrorism in the region. The states’ public authorities yielded to exigencies of national security, as well as the political survival of the governments in power, and surrendered respect for human rights. Yet, the extent of the violence of counterterrorism responses differed across the Central Asian republics. To explain this intriguing variation, this study relied on the tenets of Rationalism and Constructivism about the impact of political violence, the ideas about the nature of terrorist threat and states’ capabilities and views on the appropriateness of the use of force on the states’ counterterrorism policies.

In all Central Asian states, the threat of terrorism became associated with activities of radical Islamic groups in the region. The Central Asian governments’ understanding of security risks related to terrorism, religious extremism and Islamism was contingent not only on the magnitude of political violence and terrorism in the region, but also on the circumstances of introduction and practice of Islam in the societies of Central Asia.

Not only the states’ capabilities to combat terrorism, but also the differing views on the acceptability of repressive policies, the varied role of violence and the use of force have affected the scale of repression within the Central Asian republics. The contacts of Central Asian states with each other, as well as with other states of the world, have also influenced their governments’ views on the problem of terrorism in the region.
The study illuminated some areas for future research. First, it demonstrated how international environment can influence the policies of newly independent states. It showed how international apathy can perpetuate and reinforce inhuman and unlawful practices in the states. It illustrated how the context of the ‘war on terrorism’ can provide a golden opportunity for undemocratic regimes to curb domestic opposition. Further analysis is required to explore conditions under which international norms, expectations of other states and international context affect foreign and domestic policies of states.

The case studies revealed that disproportionally stern governmental measures caused a backlash among the opposition movements. A future study should examine the question of a dynamic interaction between repressive counterterrorism policies and terrorism. The outbreaks of violence in the Central Asian states suggested that the strategy of governmental reprisals is failing and it raised the question of whether draconian approaches can only exacerbate an already precarious situation. It has been argued that repressive responses by authorities are counterproductive and that those states with policies conforming to the goals and principles of the UN Charter are likely to be the ones least affected by terrorism.115

---

10 For the purpose of this paper I utilize the RAND’s definition of terrorism that is inclusive of the types of acts that the governments of Central Asian states consider as terrorist attacks. In short, terrorism is violence, or the threat of violence, committed with purpose of creation of an atmosphere of fear in order to coerce others into actions they would not otherwise undertake, or refrain from actions they desire to take. This violence or threat of violence is generally directed against civilian targets, but the motives of all terrorists are political (MIPT Terrorism Knowledge Database. Glossary. http://www.tkb.org/Glossary.jsp#T).
13 The Uzbek authorities associate Islamic fundamentalism with Wahhabism. Wahhabism is a derogatory reference to the puritanical brand of Islam that rules Saudi Arabia. Despite the fact that the more radical believers of Islam in Central Asia were labeled Wahhabis, they have always denied any association with the Wahhabis of Saudi Arabia (Nancy Lubin and Barnett R. Rubin, Calming the Ferghana Valley: Development and Dialogue in the Heart of Central Asia (New York, NY: The Century Foundation Press 1999), p.5). The Central Asian authorities tend to lump together Islamic fundamentalism and Islamism. For the purpose of this paper, I differentiate between the two. Islamism is used in reference to radical Islamic groups, mainly the Hizb ut-Tahrir or the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan, which treat Islam as a political system governing every aspect of private, social and political life in accordance with Islamic law and advocate the establishment of an Islamic state in Central Asia. Islamic fundamentalism refers to an Islam-based ideology that rejects secularization in Islam and Islamic countries and advocates the return to traditional ‘pure’ Islamic traditions, practices and beliefs.

26 Ibid.
28 Zamira Eshanova (note 14).
35 Constructivists are united in their criticism of rationalism but divided on a number of ontological and epistemological questions (e.g., constitutive vs. causal theory, explanatory vs. emancipatory cognitive interests, etc.). There are many debates that cut across ontological, methodological, and theoretical issues (e.g., an ‘agent-structure’ debate that focuses on the question of the nature of reality and how it can be explained: looking at the actors, structures, or both) (Emanuel Adler, ‘Constructivism and International Relations’, in W.Carlsnaes, T. Risse, and B.A. Simmons (eds.) Handbook of International Relations (Sage Publications 2002), p.104).
39 For further discussion see Barkin 2003 (note 38); Fearon and Wendt 2003 (note 34), p.53.
42 Solomon (note 4), p.31; ibid (note 41), pp.28-29.
44 International Crisis Group (note 5); Naumkin (note 5).
49 For example, Adolat was an informal Islamist group that grew strong in the Namangan province and other parts of the Ferghana Valley of Uzbekistan in early 1990s. It challenged local authorities by acting as a sort of voluntary Muslim militia for the enforcement of basic Islamic values and the prevention of crime. Adolat militia also tried to extend its activities to the capital of Uzbekistan, Tashkent When President Karimov visited Namangan in 1992, Islamists took an open stand for legalization of Adolat (Bohr (note 47); Naumkin (note 5), p.22).
53 Rajiv Tiwari (note 50).
54 Polonskaya and Malashenko (note 41).
62 The causal origins of civil war that began in 1992 have been a subject of a lively debate among the scholars of Central Asia. See, for example, John Glenn, The Soviet Legacy in Central Asia (St.Martin Press, Inc. 1999), pp. 12-127; Mehrdad Haghayeghi, Islam and Politics in Central Asia (St.Martin’s Press 1995), pp. 142-51.
63 Islamic militants who invaded Kyrgyzstan in 1999 and 2000 were accused of maintaining bases in northeastern Tajikistan, and former UTO combatants were accused of participating in the incursion (Human Rights Watch (note 19); Naumkin (note 5)).
64 Malashenko (note 5), p.70.
65 The Islamic Renaissance Party is also known as the Party of Islamic Rebirth and the Islamic Revival Party.
67 Polonskaya and Malashenko (note 41), p.130.
68 Naumkin (note 5), p.27.
73 International Crisis Group (note 51), p.35.
74 Hunter (note 1), p.327.
75 Najibullah (note 17).
76 International Crisis Group (note 51).
77 Vitalii Ponomarev, ‘A Watershed Event for Turkmenistan’s Political Opposition: A Commentary for the Turkmenistan Project,’ EurasiaNet, 13 Sep., 2006. http://www.eurasianet.org/departments/rights/articles/eav112503.shtml (accessed 5 Sep. 2006). There are two competing ‘theories’ of the November 2002 attack. In one, the security forces of President Niyazov staged the shooting as a pretext for tightening up control in the state. Another story tells of a failed coup attempt organized and carried out by the former Turkmen ministers who went into opposition to the Niyazov’s cabinet. For a

80 International Crisis Group (note 5), p.34.

81 Cummings and Ochs (note 21), pp.122-23.

84 Polonskaya and Malashenko (note 41), p. 33.

85 The role of Islam in the Kazakh society somewhat intensified in 16-17th century. However, the Kazakh nomads never observed Islamic prohibitions and laws very closely. Their Islamic practices largely confined to the spheres of family life and cultural rites were intertwined with pre-Islamic pagan traditions and Adat, a common law prevalent in the steppe (С. Г., Кляшторный, Т. И. Султанов, ‘Казахстан: летопись трех тысячелетий’ (Алматы 1992), 150-1; Саит Жусупов, ‘Ислам в Казахстане: прошлое, настоящее, будущее во взаимоотношениях государства и религии’, Под ред. А. Малашенко и М. Брилл Олкотт, Ислам на постсоветском пространстве: взгляд изнутри (Моск. Центр Карнеги - М: Арт-Бизнес-Центр, август 2001). http://www.carnegie.ru/ru/pubs/books/36277.htm).

86 According to the results of the exit poll conducted during the Presidential election on 4 December, 2005 by International Republican Institution in Collaboration with Baltic Surveys, and Gallup organization, 87.3% of Russian respondents voted for the incumbent president Nazarbayev. Russians constituted 30.3% of the sample of 23,780 voters interviewed at 283 polling stations. www.iri.org/pdfs/KAZ%20EXIT%20REPORT.ppt (accessed 1 May 2006).

88 ‘President says radical Islamic group stepping up activity in Kazakhstan,’ Associated Press Worldstream, 1 Sep. 2004. http://www.highbeam.com/doc/1P1:98581134/President+says+radical+Islamic+group+stepping+up+activity+in+Kazakhstan.html (accessed 19 Aug. 2006). In 2005, the Minister of Emergency Situations of Kyrgyzstan Muhambet Kopeyev announced that international terrorist activities have been rampant recently and Kazakhstan should develop its capacity 94 Though, recent scholarship has disputed this (Lubin and Rubin (note 13), p.40).

95 The south of Kyrgyzstan populated by the ethnic Uzbeks is characterized by much greater religious observance (International Crisis Group (note 5), p.22.

97 Lubin and Rubin (note 13), p.9.

101 Ibid.

and Reality of Islamist Extremism in Central Asia,’ Eurasia 21; The Role of Religion in Politics of Central Asian and Caucuses (note 46).

105 The Role of Religion in Politics of Central Asian and Caucuses (note 46).

106 The policies of Tsarist and Soviet Russia had strengthened this pattern. In the lands of nomads, the colonial regime encouraged Russification, while in the sedentary regions it sought to regulate existing Islamic institutions (International Crisis Group (note 5)).

111 Polonskaya and Malashenko (note 41), p.127.

