JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY

"as a

Poet of Childhood.

By

William Brock Fagan,

Earlham College A. B. 1910.
University of Kansas M. A. 1915.

---

A thesis submitted to the Department of English and the Faculty of the Graduate School in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the Master's Degree.

Kansas University.

June 1st., 1915.
TO

WILLIAM N. TRUEBLOOD,

Friend and Teacher.
PREFACE.

Two things have led me to write this thesis: First, the genuine beauty of Riley's poetry; and second, the fact that my own boyhood was spent not far from the scenes which Riley has used in so much of his genre poetry. The beauty of the poetry was impressed upon me under the remarkably inspirational teaching of William N. Trueblood of Earlham College.

I here express my appreciation of the sympathetic guidance of Professor Selden L. Whitcomb, of the University of Kansas, who has helped me so much in the preparation of this thesis.

All foot-notes and page references are to the Biographical Edition of Riley's Works, published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

W. B. F.

CONTENTS

Introduction 1
Table showing the number of child poems and Riley's developing interest in the subject 12

Part I The Child Self-Revealed 14
  Grouping of the Dialect Poems 17 = 45
    Adventure Poems 17
    Pathos 45
    The Child's Sense of Morality 52
    The Child's View of Heaven 55
    The Child's Observing Mind 58

Part II The Child as Seen in Riley's Memory 62
  Riley's Interest in the Backward Look 64
  Interest in Elemental Nature 67
  Interest in Parents 76
  Interest in the Home and the Neighborhood 78

Part III The Diction 90
  Verse Form 90
  Diction Proper 92
    Words and Figures 94
    Hoosier Dialect 97

Part IV The Sociology of the Child Poems 101
  Riley's Children are Home-keeping children 101
    The Child's Relation to Parents 103
    The Child's Relation to the Home 105
    The Child's Relation to the Neighborhood 108
    The Child's Relation to the School 111
    The Child's Relation to the Outside World 112

Appendix
  Grouping of the Child Poems on the basis of Stanza Form.

General Index.
James Whitcomb Riley, the man, ever has his thoughts turned back to James Whitcomb Riley, the boy. A note of sweet melancholy runs through his verses as he recalls the happy times of his boyhood. And often as he thus goes back in thought to those times, he becomes again the child whom he remembers and all unaffectedly he speaks in the language of the boy, with the boy's ungrammatical sentences and his mispronounced words. For Riley passed his boyhood in Greenfield, Indiana, then a small country town in a rich farming country, where the emphasis in society was upon neighborly hospitality and not upon a very high degree of intellectual culture.

"My boys and girls are town boys and girls, not children living in the country," says Riley. "They touch the country but are not actually of it. Were they country boys and girls, they would not, as I take it, see any novelty in country life." Thus he himself loved the country neither as a city boy, for whom the country is no more than a novelty to be reveled in for a day and then given up, nor as a country boy to whom the delights of the open country are often not revealed and who often desires to get away from surroundings which speak only of hard work. Riley loved the country because there was "the old-swimmin' hole," and the "old hay-mow"; there were the people whom a boy could love, "the Raggedy Man" and "Lizabeth Ann" and the country-baked cakes and pies such as are never to be found in the city. The natural freedom-loving spirit of the boy found in the country a chance to exercise itself in wandering among the hills and fields. And always there was a new wonder to behold or an old one to give delight.

As the boys tramp from town "out to Old Aunt Mary's" the things they observe, which stir within them those strange "intimations of immortality," are things which the country boy knows about indifferently if he is pressed to tell of them, but which the town boy not only knows about, but loves to be among, because they thrill him with longings and desires which only the boy can ever feel. The reader may find mentioned in one poem - Out to Old Aunt Mary's - more than forty things which are characteristic of the country and country folk, but which a country-bred boy would not mention as particularly noticeable, though the town-boys found in them cause for memorable enjoyment.

In all Mr. Riley has written 232 poems for or about children, 104 of which are in dialect. Two favorite subjects for his dialect poems were The Raggedy Man and Uncle Sidney, imagined characters who in reality would be, from the boys' standpoint, ideal companions. Speaking of Children's dialect Mr. Riley himself says: 1

"In connection with this last (Helen's Babies) let us very seriously inquire what this

1 Biographical Edition, VI, 393."
real child has done that Literature should so persistently refuse to give him an abiding welcome? Since for ages this question seems to have been left unasked, it may be timely now to pronounce it. Why not the real child in Literature? The real child is good enough (we all know he is bad enough) to command our admiring attention and most lively interest in real life and just as we find him in the raw. Then why do we deny him any righteous place of recognition in our Literature? From the immemorial advent of our dear old Mother Goose, Literature has been especially catering to the juvenile needs and desires, and yet steadfastly overlooking, all the time, the very principles upon which Nature herself founds and presents this lawless little brood of hers—the children. It is not the children who are out of order; it is Literature. And not only is Literature out of order but she is presumptuous; she is impudent. She takes Nature's children and revises and corrects them till their own mother doesn't know them. This is literal fact. So, very many of us are coming to inquire, as we've a right, why is the real child excluded from a just hearing in the world of letters as he has in the world of fact? For instance, what has the lovely little magamuffin ever done of sufficient guilt to consign him eternally to the monstrous penalty of speaking most accurate grammar all the literary hours of the days of the years of his otherwise natural life? -

"Oh, mother, may I go to school
With brother Charles today?
The air is very fine and cool;
Oh, mother, say I may!"

- Is this a real boy that would make such a request, and is it the real language he would use? No, we are glad to say that it is not. Simply it is a libel, in every particular, on any boy, however fondly and exactly trained by parents however zealous for his ever-decorous future. Better, indeed, the dubious sentiment of the most trivial nursery jingle, since the latter at least maintainsthe lawless though wholesome spirit of the child-genuine, -

"Hink! Minx! The old witch winks -
The fat begins to fry;
There's nobody home but Jumping Joan, Father and Mother and I."

Though even here the impious poet leaves the soar of grammatical knowledge upon childhood's native diction; and so the helpless little fellow is again misrepresented, and his character, to all intents and purposes, is assaulted and maligned outrageously thereby.

"Now in all seriousness, this situation ought not to be permitted to exist, though to change it seems an almost insurmountable task. The general public, very probably, is not aware of the real gravity of the position of the case as even unto this day it exists. Let the public try, then, to contribute the real child to the so-called Child Literature of its country, and have its real child returned as promptly as it dare show its little tousled head in the presence of that scholarly and dignified institution. Then ask why your real child has been snanked back home again, and the wise mentors there will virtually tell you that Child Literature wants no real children in it, that the real child's example of defective grammar and lack of elegant deportment would furnish to its little patrician patrons suggestions very hurtful indeed to their higher morals, tendencies and ambitions. Then, although the general public couldn't for the life of it see why or how, and might even be reminded that it was such a rowdying child itself, and that its father—the Father of his Country—was just such a child; that Abraham Lincoln was just such a lovable, lawless child, and yet was blessed and chosen in the end for the highest service man may render unto man, - all - all this argument would avail not in the least, since the elegantly minded purveyors of Child Literature cannot possibly tolerate the presence of any but the refined children - the very proper children - the studiously thoughtful, poetic children; - and these must be kept safe from the contaminating touch of our rough-and-tumble little fellows in "hodden gray," with frowzy heads, begrimed but laughing faces, and such awful, awful vulgarities of naturalness, and crimes of simplicity, and brazen faith and trust, and love of life and everybody in it. All other people are getting into Literature; and without some real children along will they not soon be getting lonesome.
too?"

These children are real Hoosier children, good-natured, lazy, freedom-loving children, caring little for school but learning many things in their frolics and tramps. Chiefly, as Riley shows them to us, they learn to feel with Nature and are kind-hearted, loving and lovable.

But the outward life of these natural children is not the only thing about which Mr. Riley writes. He has a remarkable appreciation of the sensitiveness of children. Children feel more intensely than adults. The sense of loss experienced by a child at the death of one dear to him is far more intense than that of an adult. An anticipated joy has nothing to mar it for a boy, and he has but a faint sense of the truth of the maxim "anticipation is greater than realization."

The child's life, therefore, in its emotions and conceptions, viewed through the eyes of a grown-up person, who is able to retain impressions upon his childhood, is an idealized life. The emotional experiences of the child are vivid and when expressed objectively by a mature mind, they have something inexplicable beautiful about them. Many poets, notably Blake and Wordsworth, have felt this. In The Angel Blake has expressed the intense sorrow and delight of the child whose tears are wiped away by an angel. Then the angel fled, but

"Soon my angel came again:
I was armed, he came in vain;
For the time of youth was fled,
And gray hairs were on my head."

So, too, Riley with his ability to retain and express this mystic characteristic of childhood, does not so avowedly attempt a philosophical or psychological explanation of it, but with a more truly poetic insight does express its beauty, making us feel with him the strange nearness of the child to the infinite. The child is not a little man in the sense that he strives to be good and do right with any moral consciousness, but he is near the Source of good even in his mischief and suggests heaven and the angels to Riley.
"But with crown tipped out behind,
And the glad hand of the wind
Smoothing back your hair, I see
Heaven's best angel smile on me,—
Little Tommy Smith."

He, too, had "intimations of immortality," and ascribes to the babe an almost congenital sense of The Beautiful City. In the poem of this name, he says of the Beautiful City that

"We slacken our lips at the tender
White breasts of our mothers to hear
Of its marvelous beauty and splendor:—
We see:—but the gleam of a star."

In this connection Riley has almost a passion for the pathetic mystery of a dead babe. He expresses this in "Give me the Baby," but better in "The Way the Baby Slept."

"This is the way the baby slept:
A mist of tresses backward thrown
By quavering sighs where kisses crept
With yearnings she had never known;
The little hands were closely kept
About a lily newly blown—
And God was with her, and we wept—
And this is the way the baby slept."

The following table shows that more than one-fifth of all Riley's poems are on childhood.

Poems on Child Life

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Total no. of poems</th>
<th>In dialect</th>
<th>Not in dialect</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1870-1879</td>
<td>17.1</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1880</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1881</td>
<td>56</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1882</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1883</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1884</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1885</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1886</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1887</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1888</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1889</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1890</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1891</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1892</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1893</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1894</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1895</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1896</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>5</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1897</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1898</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1899</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1900</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1901</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1902</td>
<td>64</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1903</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1904</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1905</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1906</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1907</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1908</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1909</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1910</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1911</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Date</td>
<td>Total no. of poems</td>
<td>In dialect</td>
<td>Not in dialect</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>--------------------</td>
<td>------------</td>
<td>---------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1912</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1913</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1023</td>
<td>104</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total number of child poems 232.
Part I.

The Child Self-Revealed.

When a writer recalls the days of his childhood he links the present with the past and the picture which he gives in his poems is not a picture true in all its details to that past. Whitier, invoking a blessing upon the barefoot boy, does so because he sees his own lot as a man less delightful than the lot of the boy, a thought which could never come to the mind of the boy. Wordsworth, too, philosophizes upon childhood and so does Mr. Riley in many of his poems.

In about half of his child poems, however, the child speaks for himself. In such poems it is obvious that the child ought to express only childish thoughts. His own speaking precludes retrospection and consequent speculation in that direction. But the child may express truths intuitively about which he could not have any speculations at all. The little maid of eight years was unable to conceive of death as Wordsworth conceived of it, yet in her persistent contention that "We are seven," she expressed the incontrovertible truth that those who were lying in the churchyard had gone away just as those two at sea had gone away; and for the little maid, at least, one pair was no more dead and no more alive than the other.

Since 1907, Mr. Riley has written only about a dozen poems, two of which are in the language of the child.

The first of these poems written in the language of the child is Johnson's Boy, dated 1876. It expresses fairly accurately a true bovish sentiment. Johnson's Boy is that unlucky, mistreated chap who gets blamed for everything. But the language of the boy is not altogether what the language of such a boy would be. Riley has not yet become the master of child language to whom we listen with delight in Little Orphant Annie and The Bear Story.

"You tackle any scholar
In wisdom's wise employ," is hardly the phrase of a boy, nor would he likely choose "sonorous" to rhyme with chorus.

But in the second of these poems.
Prior to Miss Belle's Appearance, dated 1877, Riley has caught not only the spirit of the child, but the language as well. Nobody but a real "Willie" could speak as this child does with his repeated appeals for confirmation from "Charley" and his pronunciation of such words as "th'uther."
"chawk'lut drops" , "An' nen, bime-by,"
"noller" and "mucher." In this poem, too, Riley exhibits that characteristic in which he excels above all other humorous poets, the combining of the humorous and pathetic, than which there is no other quality in poetry that can so stir the feelings of the large majority of readers. After the ridiculous recital which Willie makes to Miss Belle's sweetheart, he ends with

"But our sister Fanny's in Heaven!

Here's where you go ef you die! -

Don't you Charley? - Men you has wings -

I'at like Fanny! An' purtiest things! -

Don't you Charley! An' men you can fly -

I'at fly - an' everything ....... Wiant I'd die! 3

And now that Riley has caught the viewpoint and the language of the child we find him expressing, as a child, a variety of childish conceptions and emotions. His poems are most genuinely child poems, that is the child speaking in the first person speaks most nearly as a child does, in the poems in which he relates an adventure.

The first of these adventure poems is Jack the Giant Killer. dated 1830. Riley has designated it the "Bad Boy's Version," probably with a little touch of his gentle irony, for the boy is not bad - he is only a typical boy in his love of adventure and in an exaggerated conception of bravery. "The story is of a boy. " name wuz Jack." who with his " sword and buckle and 'visibul can " killed giants " 'at et whole cows." He finally swims a river to attack " ole Bumblebore " of the four heads, whom he slays without any difficulty. The boy ends the story with " Wisha 'at I'd been Jack! - Don't you?"

The diction of the poem is full of mistranscriptions, but they are the characteristic mistakes of the boy of the small Indiana town. The o in once, the a in was, the o in other, the e in castle are given a broad u sound resulting in such words as wunat, wuz, uther and castul. The boy fore-shortens and contracts words: Fact is fac', invisible is 'visibul, that is 'at, and is an', old is ols, before they knew is 'fore 'ey knowed, because is 'cause. Giants is Gi'nts. and then is nen. The subject of the verb is often omitted, as is also the relative pronoun in relative clauses.

The meter of the poem is predominantly the iambic tetrameter although this varies, the anapest frequently giving emphasis to a phrase as - "Tell you a Story -"

An Impetuous Resolve reveals the very small boy's delight in imagining a time when he can have in large what his boyish fancy conceives of as the most delightful of all enjoyments. Three of his little friends are going to be a tailor, a sailor and a carriage-maker, respectively, when they grow up. The little fellow who is speaking is "go' to be a Baker" and the height of his ambition is to drive off with his three playmates

"A-slingin' pie-crust long the road for ever an' forever."

The childish delight in simple things is further shown in At Aunty's House. The little town boy has gone to visit "Away in the country!" where

"They's just but woods - and pigs and cows -
An' all's outdoors and air! -
An' orchard-swing; an' churry trees -
An' churries in 'em!"

In all this paradise for a boy's heart the climax of delight was reached when

"We et out on the porch!"

This is almost an anticlimax for an adult reader who cannot feel the delight with the boy.
The reader's understanding is not sufficient to appreciate it. It is a childish delight which only a child's heart can feel. This, of course, is the charm of all Riley's child poetry.
He himself is a child in his sensitiveness, his imagination and his appreciation.

One poem alone is sufficient proof of this - A Runaway Boy. The little boy's resolve to run away when his father has punished him, his taking of all his "copper-cents," his entrance into the outside world through the jimson-weeds "all down the road," his fright at all the strange things he sees, his delight in being rescued by a big girl, and his joyous return, when his mother kisses him, on his promise not to run away again — all this is Riley, the little boy, speaking, and it is just an accident that Riley is a man when he writes it.

In 1896 Mr. Riley wrote to his brother, John A. Riley, a letter expressing his intention of writing "a child poem of a whole book's length — and the which, God bless it! I have very happily started and advanced in many pages." He asks his brother to furnish him with all the little incidents which he can recall, and this the latter did.

"We are all embraced in the simple history, though under names known only to the family" writes Mr. Riley in the same letter. —

"since I find it necessary, in order to accomoderate the very modest writer, that he also must appear in third person."

Mr. W. D. Howells reviewing the poem says: "From beginning to end it moves through the world of childhood, the childhood of that vanished West which lay between the Ohio and the Mississippi, and was, unless memory abuses my fondness, the happiest land that ever there was under the sun. There were no very rich nor very poor in that region, which has since become the very hotbed of millionairism, but an equality of condition never matched before or since, so that the picture of the peaceful, kindly life in one village family, which Mr.
Riley gives, is the portrait of all village family life then and there." 5

There are in the poem really twenty three separate poems, each setting forth some incident or some story of childhood. The prog 5 Biog. Edition IV, 549. is a beautiful lyric, reminiscent of his child world - A Fairy Paradise - a lyric of pathos, recalling all of the mystical happiness of childhood and ending with an idea which suggests Wordsworth and what nature meant to him in childhood:

"Oh Child-World. After this world - just as when I found you first sufficed
My soulmost need - If I found you again
With all my childish dream so realized,
I should not be surprised."

The second of the series is The Child-World, from which the entire poem takes its name. It is really an introductory poem giving the setting of the whole. Riley speaks of his old home as

"A simple old frame house - eight rooms in all - Set just one side the center of a small
But very hopeful Indiana town -"

This is Greenfield, at that time a typical country town of 300 inhabitants thirty miles east of Indianapolis on the National Road, which as Riley says, the old timers, all who linger yet will happily recall and tell of its importance. "long and long afore Railroads wuz ever dream' of."

These as Mr. Riley says were the times

"Called Good Old. And why 'Good Old?' Once a rare Old Chronicler was asked, who brushed the hair out of his twinkling eyes and said - "Well John, they're 'good old times' because they're dead and gone!"

Next Riley describes "the old home site . . . portioned into three distinctive lots, '" the front one "facing south and blossoming in old fashioned flowers, "lilies, dahlia, rose, and flowering vine." Behind this on the left was the woodhouse, half of which was piled with wood, the other half being used for the workshop. This must have been a delightful place to the boy Riley for he describes minutely all of the tools, recalling his delight in them, as "Rapture infinitesimal." Three trees, he recalls, were planted about this woodhouse,

7 Ibid., 356.
"The Prince's Harvest" - magic phrase. "The Old Sweet-Apple Tree," and

There was a cherry tree. Its bloomy snows
Cool even now the feverish sight that knows
No more its airy visions of pure joy
As when you were a boy."

The third lot was the garden behind the front lot on the right, opposite the wood house. He recalls it surrounded by apple trees.

"a stand of beas," a white-winter-permain," current-bushes " and a quince or so," with "The old grape-arbor in the center, by

The pathway to the stable, with the sty
Behind it, and upon it, coothing flocks
Of pigeons,- and the cutest 'martin-box'
Made like a sure-enough house - with roof and doors,
And windows in it, and veranda - floors
And balusters all around it - yes, and at Each end a chimney - painted red at that
And pencil white, to look like little bricks;
And, to cap all the builder's cunning tricks,
Two tiny little lightning rods were run
Straight up their sides, and twinkled in the sun.
Who built it? Nay, no answer but a smile -
It may be you can guess who, after while." 9

The poem closes with lines which recall the open-hearted neighborliness of the inhabitants of the little town:

8 & 9 Ibid., 358.
"And the spade
And the hoe and rake and shovel all, when laid Aside, were in their places, ready for
The hand of either the possessor or
Of any neighbor, welcome to the loan
Of any tool he might not chance to own." 10

After Riley has introduced the reader to the place of the child world, he recalls in memory the personnel of the Child World in the next poem, The Old Home Folks. In its scheme the poem resembles somewhat The Prelude of Wordsworth. It recalls all of the children and older people who made up this 'world.'
These were, first, the children of his own family: "Johnty," the poet's older brother; Bud, the poet himself; Maynnie, the elder of the poet's two sisters; Alex, a younger brother; and "baby Lizzie." Next the poet mentions his father, with "his hale manhood, ....... a lawyer and a leading citizen." His mother he recalls as

"The gentle mother. Her mild, plaintive face
Was purely fair and haloed with a grace
And sweetness luminous when joy made glad

10 Ibid., 360.
Her features with a smile; or saintly sad
As twilight fell the sympathetic gloom
Of any childish grief, the curtain drawn Across the window and the sunshine gone.
Her brow, below her fair hair's glimmering strands Seemed meetest resting-place for blessing hands
Or holiest touches of soft finger tips
And little rose-leaf cheeks and dewy lips." 11

Following this tribute to his mother,
he refers to himself

"Prone on the floor above a book
Of pictures with a rapt ecstatic look,
Even as the mother's .........."

And he imagines that she was listening to "some poem going by." This poem, The Child-heart, which follows, shows that Riley idealizes the innocence and purity of childhood as Wordsworth did; but whereas Wordsworth lessens the force of his ideal by his psychologic study of it, Riley creates the ideal and reverently withdraws to contemplate it, not to study it, leaving us a far more beautiful and therefore truer picture of childhood.

"Nay, little child-heart, you have never need To fear us; - we are weaker far than you -
'Tis we who should be fearful - we indeed
Should hide us, too, as darkly as you do, -
Safe as yourself, withdrawn, Hearing the world roar on Too wilful, woeful, awful for the child-heart!"

This ideal conception is shown, too, in the four line refrain to each verse:

"Child-heart! - mild heart! -
Ho my little wild heart! -
Come up here to me out o' the dark.
Or let me come to you!"

As elsewhere in his poetry, Mr. Riley expresses all sense-perceptions vividly. His ear and eye are sensitive to beauty and to all sights and sounds that impress childhood.

As he recalls his old home,

"A rose
Taps at the window, as the sunlight throws
A brilliant, floating checkerwork of shine
And shadow . . . . . . . . . . . .
Across the home-made carpet."

and

"Sounds drop in visiting from everywhere."

12 Ibid., 369.
13 Ibid., 370.
But Riley never descends to the sensual and even the less refined phases of the sensuous he can not express with the poetic fineness that marks the diction of his better poetry. He often attempts to recall the famishing hunger and the keen enjoyment in eating which is characteristic of the boys of the out of doors, but such passages are less suggestive than those of the senses of sound or sight. The part of The Old-Home Folks, therefore, which recalls the kitchen with its "Redolent savorings of home-cured meats" lacks the poetic merit of the rest of the poem.

Two other older members of the family 'Cousin Rufus' and 'Uncle Mart', Mr. Riley also recalls, the latter a favorite, perhaps because he was just such a dreamer as his famous nephew, for

"Like some lone castaway in alien seas,
He built a house up in the apple trees." 14

for the children, but found an equal delight with them in spending the afternoon "mooning over some novel."

After the members of his own family, Riley recalled the boyhood chums of the neighborhood. He named them for us, but who they were is perhaps of less interest to the reader than their characteristics. None are "bad boys." Probably in real life these boys were not bad boys, but whether they were or not it is not likely that Riley would so picture them. For Riley is thoroughly moral in all his poetry. All that is ugly, that is all that does not harmonize with poetic truth (and for Riley poetic truth and poetic beauty are synonymous) is foreign to his poetry. Probably it is for this reason that Riley's children are all below that age to which psychologists apply the terms moral and immoral.
The boys are, however, lovers of adventure. They read "wild west" tales and enact them afterwards. We note here that Riley also became acquainted, along with his companions, with Robin Hood and Don Quixote.

And as he recalls this acquaintance he breaks forth into the most artistically beautiful part of the entire poem:

"O Wonderland of wayward childhood! What
An easy, breezy realm of summer calm
And dreamy gleam and gloom and bloom and balm
Thou art! The Lotus-Land the poet sung,
It is the Child-world while the heart beats young." 15 and he prays:

"O green and gold old Earth of ours, with azure overhung
And looped with rainbows! - grant us yet this grassy lap of thine -
We would be still thy children, through the shower and shine!" 16

Another boy, Noey, whom Riley pictures as a special friend of his little sister, Lizzie, was a boy of many talents. He could make bows and arrows, fish-traps, and all such 15 Ibid., 379.

16 Ibid., 380.
things that fed the adventurous spirit of the boyhood days of the poet and his ohums. Noey knew the names of all the flowers and birds, and he could whistle "phenomenally unmelodious."

The last character mentioned in The Old-Home Folks, is "The Noted Traveler." who came one day, an old friend of the elder Mr. Riley but a stranger to the children. He spends several days with the family and in the series of Child-World poems takes part as a teller of tales and a doer of sleight-of-hand tricks greatly mystifying but delighting the children.

To a child with its imagination keenly alive, a little journey of a half mile to a neighbor's house may be commensurate in adventurous interest to the thousand mile journey of a man. Thus in the poem At Noey's House, Riley reveals the boy's interest in a neighborly visit and describes all those things which the keen eyes of the children delighted in.

"At Noey's house, - when they arrived with him How snug seemed everything and neat and trim: The little picket-fence and little gate - Its little pulley and its little weight, - All glib as clockwork, as it clicked behind Them, on the little red brick pathway, lined With little paint-ket vases and tea-pots Of wee moss-blossoms and forget-me-nots; And in the windows, either side the door, Were ranged as many little boxes more Of like old-fashioned larkspurs, pink and moss And fern and phlox: while up and down across Them rioted the morning glory vines On taut-set cotton strings, whose snowy lines Whipped in and out and under the bright green Like basting-threads; and here and there between A showy, shiny hollyhock would flare Its pink among the white and purple there."

Although Riley is revealing a "child-world," this is not entirely a world in which only children dwell. The children find delight in neighborly visits of older folk. In The Loehrs and the Hammonds such a visit is described. A neighbor boy leaning over the back

17 At Noey's House IV. 390. fence announces the arrival:

"'Hey, Bud! O Bud!' rang out a gleeful call, " 'The Loehrs is come to your house'. " 18 and Riley remembers this as "Glorious news! - "

and speaking for all of them he adds:

"Nor until their earth-life ends
Will that bright memory become less bright
Or dimmed indeed. " 19

Here, as is his wont in so many of his poems, Riley introduces the touch of romantic tenderness and pathos, that characteristic which, even before his humor, puts the stamp upon what he writes that carries it through the land into the hearts of the common people. As the candles are lighted in the evening the story of "the stranger guests," who have come with the Loehrs is quietly told. It is the story of a delicate wife and a strong man who "had no children."

18 The Loehrs and the Hammond, IV, 396.
19 Ibid., 397.
"As he answered so, The man's arm went about his wife and she Leaned toward him, with her eyes lit prayerfully; Then she arose - he following - and bent Above the little sleeping innocent Within the cradle at the mother's side He patting her all silent as she cried -" 20

Here Riley breaks from his story to insert a poem of six stanzas on this suggested theme. But the narrative element is wholly subordinated to the lyric, the rhythm and emotion of which have scarcely been surpassed in English poetry. I quote the first two verses and the last:

"In the warm health-giving weather My poor wife and I Drive up and down the little town And the pleasant roads thereby: Out in the wholesome country We wind from the main highway, In through the woods' green solitudes - Fair as the Lord's own day.

We have lived so long together, And joyed and mourned as one, That each with each, with a look for speech. Or a touch, may talk as none But Love's elect may comprehend - Why the touch of her hand or mine Speaks volume-wise and the smile of her eyes To me, is a song divine.

. . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . .

The dusk, the dew, and the silence! "Old Charley" turns his head Homeward then by the pike again. Though never a word is said - 20 Ibid... 398.
One more step and a lingering one -
After the fields and farms -
At the old Toll-gate with the woman await
With a little girl in her arms. " 21

From this poem of pathos Riley turns to the portraying of a homely scene in the next poem, 'The Hired Man and Floretty.' It represents the hired man and Floretty and the children gathered in the kitchen, the hired man eating his supper while the children pop corn. Then they all go into the "sitting room" where "the company had been increased in number," a neighborhood gathering such as Mr. RRiley must have known and highly delighted in when a boy. Of the twenty-two poems in The Child-World, the fifteen remaining recount the tales told and the songs sung by the various members of the company as each one contributes his share to the entertainment. Of these fifteen three are stories told by children and are by far the best. Maymie's Story of Red Riding Hood, Bud's Fairy Tale and The Bear Story. They are best because in theme Mr. Riley shows an instinctive appreciation of the child nature. In these three poems there is not a line that betrays the speaker a grown up man. The language is exactly that of a Hoosier child, imaginative, full of exaggeration and of grammatical errors. The children hesitate in the telling of their stories just as children actually do. Their imaginations involve the stories in many inconsistencies; but the intensity of the children's interest carries the tales on triumphantly and the reader is fascinated not only by the tales themselves but by the children's evident belief in the truthfulness of their own exaggeration.

21 Ibid., 398-399.

Maymie's Story of Red Riding Hood is, of course, told by a little girl. Being a girl, she desired to be quite proper in the telling of the story, careful not to exaggerate too much and to make "Little Red Riding Hood" a very good little "lady." But Maymie's own little acts of waywardness and her unconventional manners reveal themselves, though she tries hard to conceal them and promptly corrects herself when she makes a slip. After Red Riding Hood's mother has filled a basket full of good things to eat she

" - tell her take 'em to her old Dram'ma - And not to spill 'em neever - cause ef she 'Ud stomp her toe an' spill 'em, her Dram'ma She'll haf to punish her." 22

Then the little girl goes "a skippin off"

"No! She didn't do a skippin, like I said: - She ist went walkin' - careful like and slow - Ist like a little lady - walkin' long As all polite an' nice - an' slow - an' straight - An' turn her toes - ist like she's marchin' in The Sunday School p-seesion! " 23

As she goes through the wood walking thus properly

" she 'ud ketch The purty butterflies, and grasshoppers,

22 Maymie's Story of Red Riding Hood, IV. 413. 23 Ibid., 413.
And stick din' trough 'em - No!
I jest said that!
'Cause she's too dood an' kind an' 'bedient
To hurt things thataway. " 24

True to what a child should wish May-mic ends the story with the complete overthrow of the wolf which is "dead an' killed - an ever'thing! " Probably recognizing the im-probabilities in the story and wishing to impress upon her hearers that there are no im-probabilities, she ends the story thus:

" An' story's honest truth - an' all so, too! "

Not only has Riley caught the spirit of the child in this poem, he has caught the spirit of the feminine child. As I have pointed out he has represented the little girl as trying to be quite conventional, in spite of her instinctive tendency toward the mischievous if not improper. There is also a gentleness, even in the " droll" of the wolf, which "Alex" or 24: Ibid., 414.
"Bud" would have made a veritable roar. If Maymie's story is read with "The Bear Story" that Alex 'ist made up his-own-sef, the difference between Riley's boy and girl is evident. "The Bear Story" is more original than Maymie's story, for the girl keeps pretty close to the story of Red Riding Hood as she has heard it. The story is of a little boy who, being chased by a big bear and a little bear, climbs up into a tree. As he climbs the bears pursue him. The narrator who tells his story somewhat disconnectedly, owing to his concern with making the story sound as wonderful as possible, keeps recurring to the boy's climbing higher and higher until one must imagine him several hundred feet above the ground. But the limitations of a child's world are shown in this, for this imaginery height to which the boy has climbed is designated by "Alex" as

"'Higher'n iss here house iss! "
The boy's exaggerations are much greater than the girl's for he is not hampered by as fine a sense of truthfulness as she is. The impression of the bigness and ferocity of the bear and the terrible plight of the boy are the all important things to which all questions of truth must be subordinated. The bear is killed, but when this fact interferes with the story he comes to life at once. Likewise the little boy's gun falls to the ground and breaks causing the little boy many tears, but when the story demands a gun with which the old bear is accidentally to kill himself, the little boy's gun is whole again.

The masculine tone in the poem is shown in various ways. In spite of the little boy's fear, upon having to remain in the tree all night, he discovers that it is an apple tree and he

"Et apples - 1st all night - an' cried - and cried."
And after the bear accidentally kills himself with the boy's gun, the boy grows brave at once.

"An' nen the little boy clumb down the tree
An' chopped his old wooley head off,
- Yes, and killed
The other bear ag'in, he did - an' killed
All boff the bears, he did - and tuk 'em home
And cooked 'em, too, an' et 'em."

- An' that's all." 25

But the reader wishes it were not all, for there is in our literature no more delightful story to be found anywhere.

Bud's Fairy Story, while a delightfully naive child's tale, is full of a finer poetic quality than either Maymie's story or the Bear Story. The imagination that could create the story is no more active than the imagination of many children, but the imagery of the poem in several places betrays the poet, the master of poetic imagination and of power of suggestion. The poem represents what a little boy saw as he sat in his father's grape arbor:

25 The Bear Story, IV, 459. a fairy named Squidijoum, very small and very saucy, who is caught by the boy and made to reveal the home of the lady fairy, Miss Hoodijoum, at whose house a fairy tea-party is to be held that afternoon. The fairy conducts the boy to a cabbage leaf, under which is " a awful great big olod." When this has been rolled away at the fairy's direction, both fairy and boy stand upon the wet spot found under it. The fairy commands the boy to close his eyes and they then rapidly descend. When they stop the boy looks about him.

"Nen when I looked - Oh! they'uz purtiest place
Down there you ever saw in all the world! -
They 'uz ist flowers and woses - yes and twees
Wiv blossoms on an' big wine apples boff!
An' butterflies, they wuz - an' hummin' birds -
An' yellberbirds and blue birds - yes an' wad! -
An' ever 'whereas an' all awound 'uz vines
Wiv wine d'serve pears on 'em! Yes, an' all An' ever'thing 'at's ever growin in
A garden - er canned up - all wine at wunst:
It wuz ist like a garden - only it
'Uz ist a little bit o' garden -bout big wound
As ist our twun'el bed is. An' all wound
An' wound the little garden'a a gold fence -
An' little gold gate too - an' ash hopper
'At's all gold, too - " 26

The little boy peeps in the window and sees several fairies to whom Squidjicoum says "Haint ye got out 'em-air-dew-dumplin's yet?" and when they "says no," he replies "Better git at 'em neni.

"Nen

They all set wound a little gold tub - an' All 'menced a-peelin dawdrops, ist like they 'Uz peaches."

The boy laughs at this sight so that "I - ist waked up. - No I ain't been asleep An' dweam it all, like you think - but it's shore Fer certain fact an' oross my heart it ist!"

The spirit of adventure, of longing to be big and do things which grown up people do is the theme of another poem which I have included in the "adventure poems." because it shows the desire for adventure though not the adventure itself. Her Poet Brother represents two children, a boy and a girl, the boy explaining what they would have and do if they "wuz big as parunts is!" They would keep a store, selling:

"Iat candy, pies an' oakes, an' not
No dry goods - 'cept a hat -
An' - plume fer you - an' 'plug' fer me.
An' clothes like ma's an' his,
'At on'y ist fer us - ef we Wuz big as parunts is."  27

The remaining poems in child dialect I have grouped under five heads, on the basis of the childish traits exhibited. These are:
First, the pathos of childhood; second, the child's sense of morality; third, the child's intuitive feeling for heaven; fourth, the child's keen, observing mind; and fifth, the child's feeling toward the home and homelike things.

The first of the poems of pathos is not in the child's own words, but the phrase from which the poem takes its name, Want to Be Whar' Mother Is is the phrase of a child repeated by the speaker of the poem, whom one supposes to be the father of the child, now dead, who constantly kept calling for his mother. The phrase, "Want to be whur mother is," repeated once, makes the first line of each of the four stanzas. It has a weird suggestiveness about it which is very impressive, suggesting to the reader's mind a sickly child whose attachment to its mother seems all the greater because of its sickness. The first three stanzas represent the father speaking rather impatiently at the child's unceasing cry; in the last stanza his impatience has given way to a sad recollection, for the child has gone, "whur mother is," leaving the father lonesome for the cry.

27 Her Poet Brother, V. 390.

Mr. Riley has found in the Christmas season sentiments for some of his best poetry; three poems, wholly or partly in child dialect, reveal his interest in the pathos of events out of harmony with the spirit of the season.

Little John's Christmas tells of some kindhearted simple country folk who prepare a Christmas tree for a little neighbor boy whose mother is very poor. They invite him to come at a certain time, planning a great surprise. When he arrives, all dressed for the occasion the surprise appears to be too much for him and he bursts out crying.

"An' mother grabs him up an' says:

'IT'S more'n he can bear -

It's all too sudden for the child,

An' too sup'risin'! - There!

'Oh, no it ain't!' - sobbed Little Johns

I ain't suprised - but I's

A-cryin' 'cause I watched you all,

An' knowed it all the time!'" 28

This poem might have been included in the group revealing the child's sense of morality, but Little Johns does not cry so much perhaps from a sense of having done wrong in watching, as from a sense of having missed a 28 Little John's Christmas, III. 475.

Great surprise.

Little Mandy's Christmas Tree is entirely in child dialect. The speaker is probably a girl, who tells the story of a little poor girl whom she and her mother visited and for whom the church prepared a little Christmas tree, which was to be revealed when the big tree should be stripped of its presents and removed. When the Sunday School teacher calls for little Mandy, -

"Nen nobody say a word, -
Stillest place you ever heard! - Till a man tintoe up where Teacher's still a-waitin' there."

Nen the man whispers so
Ist the teacher hears, you know.
Nen he tintoe back and go
Out the big door - ist so slow!

Little Mandy, though, she don't Answer - and Ma say 'she won't Never, though each year they'll be 'Little Mandy's Christmas tree.' 29

Fer nore childern ' - my Ma says -
And committee say they guess
'L Little Mandy's Tree' 'ull be Bigger than thenother tree! "

29 Little Mandy's Christmas Tree, IV, 64-65.
As almost all of Riley's poems in dialect show, this one reveals his bent toward dramatic presentation. The best example of this is not found in the child poems in dialect, however, though there are many places in them which are highly dramatic. In Nothin' to Say, the old widower, whose daughter is to be married, hides his tears by pretending to pick a straw from the girl's dress. In Little Mandy's Christmas Tree, the child with scarcely a full recognition of the pathetic situation, tells the story in its simple plainness, emphasizing all the very saddest things. This suggests an interesting fact of childhood. Children are very sensitive in the literal meaning of the word — their senses are alert and eye and ear take in everything to be seen or heard. But children only half recognize what older people call the pathetic.

But this half recognition has in it something mysterious, portentous, which is even sadder than the sadness of the grown up man or woman. He who reads Blake and Wordsworth can not fail to be struck with this. The beauty of the Ode on Immortality is beauty made brighter by the hint of the mysterious something which is gone; and every man whose childhood has felt those strange intimations, knows that they brought an "exquisite pain." Blake's child who asked for a tune about a lamb, "went to hear."

Let the reader turn from the two poems just mentioned to A Christmas Memory and he will see this sadness of a child, which being not wholly understood by the child, is thereby or therewith (as you choose to view it) made many fold more intense. If emotion to be most effective in poetry should be repressed then Riley is a genuine poet insofar as this makes a poet.
A Christmas Memory is a boy's story of his being taken to his aunt's house by his father. The father will come again for him on Christmas Day to take him back to his mother who is ill. The child's innocent talk of things which recall the mother to himself and his aunt, intensifies the sadness of the death of the mother which the reader is not told of, but which he cannot help inferring. The last stanza of only four lines gives powerfully the child's feelings, not fully, but in manner suggestive of the unexplainable pain which he is suffering; for the child feels the pain perhaps even more than the aunt does:

"Don't want Santv Claus - ner things
Any kind he ever brings! -
Don't want A'nty! Don't want Pa! -
I ist only want my Mal." 30

A Little Lame Boy's Views is a child's revelation of the world's better side, the side of sympathy and kindliness. Here, again, the whole poem is in child dialect, the child revealing his views of the kindness of the world toward him because he is a cripple. It is a pathetic poem, yet one which makes the reader glad because it reveals the fact that below the roughness and sordidness in men's natures there is kindness and sympathy though it may require a cripple to bring them out.

There are nine poems in child dialect, which reveal the child's sense of morality. In keeping with his sense of poetic truth Riley does not have the children in these poems propounding any profound system of ethics or any original moral ideas. Simple honesty, truth and justice, however, he does represent these children as recognizing and recognizing intuitively. I have said that Riley's children are neither very good nor very bad, but are normal, healthy children, quick to respond to kind- ness and to recognize the right. As Riley presents the case of the child he often does it at the expense of the adults who are involved in the poem. Thus the comic element enters into most of these poems. The little boy in Uncle Sidney is delighted to hear his uncle say, after the father corrects the boy:

"The goodest mens they is aint good As baddest little childs!" 31

In The Fishing Party a father, a mother and a son go a-fishing. The boy tells of their experiences, how they do not catch any fish, how the father is cross because the mother and boy make a noise and scare the fish, and how the mother buys a fish at the market.

"Nen at supper, Pa he won't Eat no fish, an' says he don't Like 'em - An' he pounded me When I choked! . . . . Ma, didn't he?" 32

In The Spoiled Child the child is shown as quick to imitate what he hears regard-31 Uncle Sidney, IV, 47.

32 The Fishing Party, IV, 100.
ing the goodness or badness of other children.

One little fellow is objecting to another little fellow whom his parents have "spoiled."
The former's only objection to the latter is that he asks questions, especially one which seems very objectionable. Whenever his mother is talking and mentions being somewhere her little "spoiled" son says

"Wuz I there, Ma?" 33

Riley objects to false standards of conduct demanded of children. The very finest thing about the children of Riley's poems is that they are natural. In The Youthful Patriot, adults have objected to the boy's fun on the Fourth of July. But the boy says he didn't do anything that wasn't right and can not understand the objections, saying:

"Didn't do nothin' but romp and run,
An' whoop an' holler an' bang his gun
An' bu'at fire-crackers, an' ist have fun -
An' 'ats all the little boy done!" 34

33 The Spoiled Child, IV, 246.
34 The Youthful Patriot, IV, 289.
Little Girl Two Little Girls is representative of a little girl's instinctive recognition of the goodness and badness of her own acts. So true is it to the charm and beauty of the genuinely feminine in the little girl that one can scarcely believe that a man could have written it. The little girl is highly sensitive to her mother's wise guidance; for the mother merely acts as though she were hurt by the misdeeds of the little girl, but says little. But the little girl feels the meaning of her mother's actions. She goes off by herself and cries softly, learning thus in her child's way the suffering consequent on wrong and then comes back into the house and says:

"Morning to you, Mommy dear! Where's that Bad little girl wuz here? Bad little girl's goned clean away, An' Good little girl's comed back to stay. " 35

I have referred to Riley's mention in 35 Little-Girl-Two-Little Girls, V, 132.
the Beautiful City, of the child's instinctive recognition of the element of the Divine in life and in eternity. I think no one characteristic of the man so marks him as distinctively a poet by the exclusive test of inspiration as does this feeling after the Divine. His is no Browning-like search for a first cause, nor Tennysonian faith founded on doubt. Mr. Riley feels God in life and is affected by this feeling as Keats was affected by the sense of beauty. Each bows before that which stirs in him the highest emotions. Perhaps neither is desirous of explaining the cause of the emotions; both are conscious of being painfully overjoyed in and by their presence.

In two poems Riley makes the child express this sense of heaven and the divine, in both poems somewhat abstractly, as he expresses the same ideas himself in The Beautiful City and elsewhere. In When Our Baby Died the little girl cries, apparently because every one else did. But she feels that somehow weeping is a trait of people of the earth and that in heaven there is no weeping for she says:

"All but ist the angels cried
When our baby died." 36

In the second poem this element of the child's recognition of the Divine is overshadowed by the pathos of the theme. The Happy Little Cripple recounts in his own words, the story of a child with "Curvature of the Spine." His pathetic but happy life with a good woman, his aunt, is just the theme for Riley and the poet does full justice to it. He makes the little fellow turn his thoughts upward to where "some boy's angel-mother" is and say

"... all the little childrens there's so
Straight an' strong an' fine,
There's nary angel 'bout the place with
'Curvature of the spine.'" 37

36 When Our Baby DiedII, 82.
37 The Happy Little Cripple, III, 345.
Three poems, The Squirt-Gun Uncle Maked Me, Guiney Pigs and The Pet Coon show the child alert to observe closely the details in those things which interest him. In the first poem the boy tells just where the "elder-bushes" grew from which Uncle Sidney cut the branch to use in making the squirt-gun. Then when they have gone to the woodhouse he observes all the tools in their proper places and tells exactly how Uncle Sidney made the squirt-gun.

Guiney-Pigs and The Pet Coon show this alertness of mind to observe details though in a less marked degree than The Squirt-Gun Uncle Maked Me, for the boy's interest is divided between their pleasure in watching the actions of the animals and the mere pleasure of having them.

The last group of child dialect poems I have not grouped so much on the basis of any specific emotion displayed as on the child's revelation of simple home life and "homely" people. These are The Raggedy Man, Lizabuth Ann and Little Orphant Annie, poems.

The dedication of Little Orphant Annie might well be a dedication to all of Riley's child poems for it no doubt expresses the poet's attitude toward childhood, an attitude which inclines toward the theory that, even in childhood (or perhaps Mr. Riley would say especially in childhood)

"I believe it adds a charm To spice the good a trifle with a little dust of harm." 38

And so he rather hesitatingly includes "the good ones" in the list of children to whom he dedicates the poem:

"To all the little children: - The happy ones; and sad ones; The sober; and the silent ones; the boisterous and glad ones; The good ones - Yes, the good ones, too; and all the lovely bad ones." 39

38 An Old Sweetheart of Mine. I, 70.
39 Little Orphant Annie. III, 513.
These poems are all told by a small boy, but in spite of our efforts to keep the boy in mind, we find ourselves forgetting him to become interested in the things which interest him — the Raggedy Man and 'Lizabuth Ann and Little Orphant Annie and all of their doings and savings. For Riley so puts himself in the place of the child and so makes the child's interest his own, that the reader is caught by the charm of genuine childhood. Though I might retell the themes of these poems it would fail utterly to give the reader a comprehension of them; and therefore I give only a general idea of what one may find in the poems and leave the reader to the delight of reading them himself.

All of the poems represent homely scenes and persons. Cups and saucers and crumbs and chickens, the back porch, the pigs and calves, the kitchen with its wood fire and its odors of all good things and especially of custard pies; and all of these made charming by the presence of the Raggedy Man and 'Lizabuth Ann and Little Orphant Annie - the blending of all these things into a home in a country town makes the ever delightful poems of Little Orphant Annie, The Raggedy Man, Our Hired Girl and Lizabuth Ann on Bakin' Day.
Part II.
The Child as Seen in Riley's Memory.

Riley is a versatile poet. He is a romantic poet in that his poetry is highly lyrical, melodious and emotional. Compare him with Burns and we find them both singing of the out-of-doors, of nature's influence upon them, of the common people, and often, very often, singing in the dialects of the people among whom they lived. While Burns, however, is at his best in the dialect poems, Riley's finest poems of universal truth and beauty are not in dialect.

Compare Riley with William Blake and we find them both singing of childhood, its beauty, innocence, and mysticism. Blake indulges his fancy for the mystical much further than does Riley, but is less joyful in it, allows it to depress him more. If Blake can be said, therefore, for this reason to be more of the idealist, it may be said of Riley that his attitude toward the mystery of life is more satisfying to most readers.

We might compare Riley with the other "Romanticists" of English literature. Their likeness and differences are varied and often striking and one who reads Riley will know him best, only when he hears him singing with others of his kind who have found life worth while in a sympathetic love for nature, man, and God. Milton's dictum that poetry must be "simple, sensuous, passionate" would give these romanticists a secure place in our literature. They probably would not care for our comparisons of their merits. We set Riley securely among them and say he is the latest comer. Like them all he loves the shadows that linger behind him and in half a hundred poems turns to muse on the days of childhood, many of them being days in his own childhood.

It is not without its suggestion as to what we shall find through the six large volumes in which his poems have recently been published, that the first poem in Volume I is entitled A Backward Look. The following excerpt gives the reader the viewpoint of the poet:

"My fancies . . . . . . . . . .
Left ajar the gates of my mind—
And Memory, seeing the situation,
Slipped out in the street of 'Auld Lang Syne.'"

Wandering ever with tireless feet
Through scenes of silence and jubilee
Of long hushed voices; and faces sweet
Were thronging the shadowy side of the street
As far as the eye could see;
Dreaming again, in anticipation,
The same old dreams of our boyhood days
That never come true, from the vague sensation
Of walking asleep in the world's strange waves.

It is the "faces" on "the shadowy side of the street" that Riley loves to look upon.

But he is not pessimistic as he watches them for they are "sweet" faces and his joy is found in the memory of the scenes of "jubilee" as well as of the "scenes of silence." And though the "dreams" . . . never come true" he loves to look back upon them. He continues:

"Away to the house where I was born!"

and calls up the many scenes and experiences of his boyhood days,

"When life went so like a dreamy rhyme
That it seems to me now that then
The world was having a jollier time
Than it ever will have again."

Riley's philosophy of life verifies Poe's statement that the perishableness of things gives man his delight in them and that his highest delight is always, therefore, shadowed more or less by melancholy. In To a Boy Whistling, Riley's "lost life" is suggested to him and he sees it as "a panorama sliding away" and recognizes that nothing "can buy one hour of the life" that the boy is living. "Or the trivial cause of" his "smiling face." But if nothing can buy this life in reality, Riley is able to give to his readers many an hour of it in fancy in his recital of its joy and beauty. But Riley recurs again and again to the past and the joys that have gone with it. The Old Times Were the Best, he says, giving the thought as a title to one of his shorter lyrics.

Various are the things which set Riley's fancies musing on the past. In the poem, Honey Dripping, from the Comb, he says on this theme:

"I bit an apple but a moment since
A wilted apple that the worm had spurned,
Yet hidden in the taste were happy hints
Of good old days returned."

and philosophizing upon it he continues:

"And so my heart, like some enraptured lute,
Twinkles a tune so tender and complete,
God's blessing must be resting on the fruit
So bitter yet so sweet!" 41

An empty bird's nest with a dry leaf caught within it is a melancholy reminder to him of the days gone by; and

"Fancy, flitting through the gleams
Of youth's sunny atmosphere,
Has fallen in the past, and seems,
Like this poor leaflet nestled here,
A phantom guest of empty dreams." 42

To babyhood in the poem with that title Riley cries plaintively:

"Turn back the leaves of life,—
Dont read the story,—
Let's find the pictures, and fancy all the rest;
We can fill the written pages with a brighter story
Than old Time, the story teller, at his very best." 43

In some of the very finest verses he goes drifting back among the childhood scenes of honeysuckle, humming birds and locust blossoms ending the poem thus:

"Heigh-ho! Babyhood! Tell me where you linger!
Let's toddler home again, for we have gone astray
Take this eager hand of mine and lead me by the finger Back to the lotus lands of the far away!" 44

In his backward look through his child poems, Riley's interest in elemental nature outweighs his interest in all other things.

In the forty poems which have for their sub-

Jesu the memory of childhood exclusively, there are twenty references to water, nearly all of which are references to streams. For Riley as a boy knew nothing of great bodies of water and rarely mentions such bodies. In The Used-to-be he uses the word "seas" to signify a vast, distant unknown, but the poetry of the sea does not move him. It is the rippling and the gurgling and the eddies of running water only that he recalls. He speaks of the laughter of the ripples, and shows what an influence these streams had upon his boyhood, when in his In Swimmin' Time he calls the creek, "the crooning creek." Fishing and swimming and all of the other delights to be found along these rippling streams are the things which Riley recalls with yearning that in many places amounts to melancholy.

The old path through the woods and along the creeks play a prominent part in Biographical Edition, III, 99.
calling back to Riley his childhood days."

One of the earliest of his poems, dated 1875, is entitled A Country Pathway. It begins,

"I came upon it suddenly, alone—
A little pathway winding in the weeds
That fringe the roadside; and with dreams my own,
I wander as it leads."

And it leads him in memory through woods and out to the highway, whence it

"drifts
Still onward, beckoning me."

As with the streams, so the old paths sound a note of melancholy as they beckon him, and so he closes the poem,

"O darling Pathway! Lead me bravely on Adown your valley-way, and run before
Among the roses crowding up the lawn
And thronging at the door."

"And carry up the echo there that shall Arouse the drowsy dog, that he may bay
The household out to greet the prodigal
That wanders home today." 46

Not alone these wood paths, but the long highways and dusty turnpikes are constantly calling to Riley from his boyhood days. In

Out To Old Aunt Mary's, he mentions the path of their journey six times, in such phrases as "the roadway lone", "in the dust of the road,"
"the long highway," "the road's next bend."
In Up and Down Old Brandywine, as he recalls the teams coming to town on a Saturday, he speaks of "... ... . . . . . . . . . the smokin' chokin' dust
O' the turnpike at its wuast." 47

The boy Riley seems to have loved these paths and turnpikes with the yearning love of a boy who felt their alluring call "leading on and on and on." Yet they lead him to delightful places in which he found genuine satisfaction. Not least of these places were the woods. In A Country Pathway he turns from the brook,

"To where the pathway enters in a realm of lordly woodland, under sovereign reign Of towering oak and elm.

"A puritanic quiet here reviles
The almost whispered warbles from the hedge.

And takes a locust's rasping voice and files
The silence to an edge.

"In such a solitude my somber way
Strays like a misanthrope within the gloom
Of his own shadows till the perfect day
Bursts into sudden bloom." 48

Riley feels the aura of the forest and the quiet calm if its stillness is reflected in his references to it. Musing on the "dead sea of the past" in Honey Dripping from the Comb, he says

"And suddenly we find ourselves astray
In some woods-pasture of the Long Ago." 49 and again in In Swimming-Time, he recalls his boyhood delight in "Groves of maple, elm and beech,

With the sunshine sifted thru
Branches, mingling each with each,
Dim with shade and bright with dew;
Stripling trees and poplars hoar,
Hickory and sycamore." 50

As the two boys wandered "Out to Old Aunt Mary's," the poet recalls going "... through the wood

Where the old gray snag of the poplar stood," and hearing "the woodland echoes, which stirred the primitive instincts of these civilized children, so that the poet asks,

"Where such heroes of war as we?
With bows and arrows of fantasy
Chasing each other from tree to tree."

While the streams and the paths and the forests bespeak the genuine boy in Riley, the flowers which he mentions so often reveal the poet. If we are to believe his rehearsal of his boyhood dreams in An Old Sweetheart of Mine we know this love of flowers was present in him very early. The reader will recall that in this poem the future poet looked forward to the time when he should live with his sweetheart "in a cozy little cot, hid in a nest of roses." And in Babyhood he dreams of that long ago when he was wont to

"Turn to the brook where the honeysuckle tipping
O'er its vase of perfumes spills it on the breeze,

And the bee and the hummingbird in ecstasy are sipping from the fairy flagons of the blooming locust trees."
and elsewhere in this same poem he speaks of the water
"Where the ripples dimple round the butter cups of gold."
and still again of the dragon-fly pausing
"To rest like a blossom where the water-lily died." 52
The lily is a favorite flower with Riley. In these memory poems he recalls the lily over and over again. The old man who looks back to his childhood in The Old Swimmin Hole remembers the sunshine falling on the water and how
"... It mottled the woter with amber and gold Tell the glad lilies rocked in the ripples that rolled." 53
In the poem As I Sit in the Silence the poet says
"My heart is a blossom of joy over run
With a shower of tears as a lily with rain." 54
Again in The Old Trundle-Bed he mentions the lily in connection with his memory of his mother who lulled him to sleep.

"With the old fairy stories my memories keep Still fresh as the lilies that bloom o'er the head
Once bowed o'er my own in the old trundle-bed." 55

Still other flowers are dear to the poet in his memory of the days gone by. The locust and the lotus blossom he mentions over and over again. In The Days Gone By he speaks of "... the honey suckle blossom where the water-lilies dipped."

The last stanza of The Used to be shows the delight which Riley feels in the flowers and their influence over him:

"O land of love and dreamy thoughts
And shining fields, and shady spots
Of coolest, greenest, grassy plots.
Embossed with wild forget-me-nots!
And all ye blooms that longingly
Lift your faces up to me
Out of the past, I kiss in ye
The lips of Used-to-be." 56

Although Riley has written several poems on the subjects of the rain and the storm, he has written none upon these subjects that are strictly poems of childhood or of memory. The wind, however, he does mention in a few places but it is always a summer wind and never suggestive of cold or storm. In Tommy Smith Riley remembers the little fellow, as "the glad hand of the wind" smoothed back his hair. In Little Girly-Girl, recalling her pet name he says

"That was long and long ago
But in memory the tender
Winds of summer weather blow."

And in The Old Trundle Bed he recalls how he lay awake and

"... wondering saw
The stars thru the window, and listened with awe
To the sign of the winds, as they tremblingly crept
Thru the trees..."

Amid these memories of boyhood haunts, the man Riley reserves the memory of the boy's mother as the most sacred of all. In The Old Home Folks and in one or two more poems the father is mentioned; but the qualities which Riley saw in the father were not the qualities of gentleness, tender-heartedness and fragile beauty - qualities with which Riley's nature could deal in making a poem. With pride and awe he recalls the father as an heroic man - "a being so exalted." It is "the gentle mother," with "her mild, plaintive face," who brings the warmth and the fine lyric beauty into the poems of the home.

Riley idealizes the mother in many of these poems. He remembers how his mother combed his hair (probably an imaginary conception, however) and in A Mother-Song he gives voice to a passionate longing for the mother who has gone. He idealizes her treatment of him in childhood, saying:

"... of old I had never One wish denied me, nor trouble to fret." 58

So deeply does he long for his mother that his passion makes him almost despair as he cries:

"Mother, O Mother! Must longing and sorrow
Leave me in darkness, with eyes ever wet
And never the hope of a meeting tomorrow?

Answer me, mother,

And sing, 'Little brother,

Sleep, for thy mother bends over thee yet." 59

As the poet muses on the past in
As I Sit in the Silence, he exalts the mother to the very highest place, seeing her at the throne of God pleading for her child.

The dearest of all his memories of The Old Trundle Bed are the memories of his mother as she bent over him to lull him to sleep with the old fairy stories. Mr. Riley has written no poetry with a more intense passion than that of A Mother-Song and the fourth stanza of As I Sit in the Silence. Calmer but no less intense or sincere is the single stanza of To the Mother?

"The mother-hands no longer toil may know;
The mother-eyes smile not on you and me;
The mother-heart is stillled, alas! - But 0
The mother-love abides eternally."

The House and the immediate surroundings do not play a large part in these memory poems. But when Riley does mention these things, it is with such a note of genuine feeling that we must conclude that the home meant a great deal to him as a boy. The atmosphere of home does pervade many of the poems which do not come in the group of memory poems under discussion. In these memory poems, however, Riley gives but few details of the house and its surroundings.

In A Backward Look his musings take him "Away to the house where I was born!" where he sees the old clock and the "'chany-dog' on the mantel-shelf." A Country Pathway leads him to "an old farm home-stead," but he gives no details of it. In Out to Old Aunt Mary's, however, as the boys come in sight of the house, they see all of the details of the picture
"... the gable-end
Of the fine old Huston homestead not Half a mile from the sacred spot
Where dwelt our saint in her simple cot
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

Why I see her now in the open door
Where the little gourds grew up the sides and o'er
The oakenboard roof!

Much of the remaining part of the poem is given to a detailed description of the house and its surroundings. Such things are mentioned as the lawn, the swing, the haymow, the fields near and far, the tail-race; and nearer the house the garden, the bee hives, the apple-house, the old spring house with its rows of swinging shelves with their crocks of milk.

Although he never gives a detailed description of it, Riley recalls the orchard as one of the most delightful parts of these old home scenes. He mentions it again and again but does not describe it, - as though he loved its quiet atmosphere but was not interested so much in its fruits.

Before this chapter closes two other things ought to be noted regarding Riley's memory of childhood. It will be seen, of course, that not all these memory poems are real memories of Riley's own childhood. Many of them are purely imaginary conceptions and are highly idealized. The other notable thing about some of these poems is their note of melancholy. It would seem, too, that this melancholy comes with the very dearest of the poet's memories as in A Mother-Song, which we have noted.

The note of melancholy is all gone, however, in the idealized picture of the care-free boy, Tommy Smith. The very simplicity of the name is attractive to Riley though he finds

"Scarce a name to rhyme it with."

The pure delight that the poet feels in the contemplation of the little fellow outweighs any possible feeling of regret that he is gone, and we feel the quiet joy as we meditate on the picture and are glad.

"On the verge of some far land
Still forever does he stand,
With his cap-rim rakishly
Tilted; so he smiled on me —
Little Tommy Smith."

There is a touch of the idyllic in this poem which reminds one of Blake's Songs of Innocence. The picture is true — true in the highest poetic sense that the boy is a real boy, though typifying the ideal of boyhood — but the poet's memory illumines the picture with an ever finer and finer light until the boy is not of earth but dwells in heaven in his earthly likeness!

"But with crown tipped back behind,
And the glad hand of the wind
Smoothing back your hair, I see.
Heaven's best angel smile on me,
Little Tommy Smith. " 61

The reader must turn to the poem,
The Used-to-be if he would see Riley's memory working at its best. It would be unfair to select quotations for every line is inextricably bound to every other to complete the picture of " The Land of Used-to-be! " 62

Two things mark the poem as exhibiting Riley's memory at its best. First it shows the true poet's emotion or passion working without conscious effort, resulting in a rhythm smooth and natural and in a diction highly suggestive. This passion, working thus, results also in giving to the poem its second mark of superiority—the presence of a fine poetic imagination. The Land of Used-to-be is made very real to the reader and brings only pleasure of a deep abiding nature, free from the note of sadness (or at least of morbidness) which characterizes A Mother's Song. This is not to say that the "note of sadness" in many of Riley's poems as in Burns' and Poe's and many another of our most popular poets' songs, is a mark of second rate poetry. It is merely to repeat what poets and their readers have so often expressed in their choice of "favorite" poems, namely that the emotion which is calm because it is so deep—what Mr. Stedman has called "repressed emotion"—is the highest form of all emotion, however high a more stirring emotion may be.

Another poem exhibiting similar characteristics is Little Girly-Girl. Riley writes less of girlhood than of boyhood but always idealizes his girls. Of Little Girly-Girl he says her name came to him "Down the brink of brooks that brought it Out of Paradise—..."
That was long and long ago,
But in memory the tender,
Winds of summer weather blow,
And the roses burst in splendor;
And the meadow’s grassy billows
Break in blossoms round the willows where the currents curve and curl,
Calling, "Little Girly-Girl!" 63

Though I have called the two poems just mentioned the highest examples of Riley’s memory poems, the reader, whether critic or not, turns with no less delight to such a poem as The Old Swimmin’ Hole, in which, though there is a note of sadness, there is no highly wrought passion, which generally is the result of fine idealization. Riley has adapted his versification admirably to the halting old man who, as speaker in the poem, lets his memory of the happy boyhood days wander where it will, recalling now this, now that in a very natural but illogical way; as thus:

"And the gurgle of the water round the drift just below
Sounded like the laugh of something we once’t us’ to know,

Before we could remember anything but the eyes
Of the angels looking out as we left Paradise;
But the merry days of youth is beyond our control
And it's hard to part forever with the Old Swimmin' hole. 64

We return again to an idealized picture in The Days Gone By in which Riley gives us the characteristics of childhood which make that time of life so dear (by contrast, no doubt, with the adult period when we have strayed so far "inland" as Wordsworth puts it). He closes the poem with these words:

"O the days gone by! O the days gone by!
The music of the laughing lip, the luster of the eye;
The childish faith in fairies, and Aladdin's magic ring -
The simple soul-reposing, glad belief in everything.
When life was like a story holding neither sob nor sigh,
In the golden olden glory of the days gone by. 65

These memory poems are so numerous that it would seem impossible for Riley to make each one different from the others. But the theme is one on which all men love to dwell, recalling the same scenes over and over again. Thinkin' Back, Riley has called one of his poems. The simplicity of the title is characteristic.

"Thinkin' back" he sees in imagination what all men see who have been reared in rural surroundings.
The old mill and the creek keep coming back in memories of swimming times and fishing times - coming back as the places to which the boys resorted on days when they "played truant." As a boy Riley attended school only until he was sixteen, but the little rural school seems to have impressed on his memory some beautiful pictures.

"Of the wealth of facts and fancies
That our memories may recall
The old school-day romances
Are the dearest after all." 66

But the reader reads this questioningly, allowing for the poet's particular mood, and finds it is "after all" the Friday afternoon exercises that "are the dearest." As we turn from one thing to another which the poet's memory recalls we find him idealizing them all in Our Boyhood Haunts. I quote the poem entire:

"Ho! I'm going back where We were youngsters. - Meet me there,
Dear old barefoot chum, and we Will be as we used to be, -
Lawless rangers up and down
The old creek beyond the town -
Little sunburnt gods at play,
Just as in that far-away; -
Water nymphs, all unafraid,
Shall smile at us from the brink
Of the old mill-race and wade
Tow'r'd us as we kneeling drink
At the spring our boyhood knew,
Pure and clear as morning-dew;
And, as we are rising there,
Doubly tow'rd to hear and see,
We shall thus be made aware
Of an eery piping, heard
High above the happy bird
In the hazel; And then we,
Just across the creek, shall see:
(HaH! the goaty rascal!) Pan
Hoof it o'er the sloping green,
Mad with his own melody,
Ay, and (bless the beastly man!)
Stamping from the grassy soil
Bruised scents of fleur-de-lis, Boneset, mint, and pennroyal. "

Though this is not the best of the memory poems of childhood it reveals a new phase of Riley as a child poet. No one can doubt his interest in children and his sincere reverence for all things belonging to childhood. But Riley is a poet. His interest, however sincere, in all things is the interest of the poet. Beauty, warmed by a truly romantic passion, and stimulated in its conception and expression by a poetic imagination, is Riley's delight and his highest delight. The "faculty divine" is his and I venture to say that he writes (as I believe all poets always have written) at his best as he can and not merely as he will. His "boyhood haunts" are therefore now inhabited by a creation of a poet's adult imagination. - Pan.

This poem may seem to the reader a disappointment at first. It may seem that Riley is untrue to his own chosen field. Our boyhood haunts harboring Pan of classical association in a world of middle-western children? Yet the poem expresses no incongruity. Riley is a poet. We call him a children's poet, as we call Wordsworth and Bryant nature poets, Watts a religious poet, and other poets, poets of love or patriotism. Yet is it that particular emotion, or thought or subject upon which each writes and which predominates in each, - is it that upon which we shall judge the poet at last? Rather we must judge him as a poet first, even though his emotion can not be labeled, as with Blake in many poems, or his thoughts clearly understood as with Browning in some of his lighter poems. As each poet sings his song we listen to the melody, pronouncing upon that, though the words may be secondary. If that something which makes the poem a poem pleases us we need not linger over lesser things.

Thus Riley sings of childhood and we are delighted and if Pan at first seems a stranger in Our Boyhood Haunts, it is only for a little while, for he comes with the poet whose beauty we know and love.
Part III. 67

The Diction.

I have said that Riley is a versatile poet in his choice of subject matter. The verse form of his child poetry is also quite varied. He writes almost exclusively in rhymed stanzas, there being only three unrhymed poems in all of the two hundred child poems. There are twenty-two poems not in verse form, some of them being "paragraphed." There are five poems containing verses of varying lengths, and there is one one-act "drama" (so entitled).

Riley's favorite verse form is the eight-line stanza, the stanza in fifty-eight of these child poems being of this length. The four-line stanza comes next, with forty-one poems. The rest of the poems are divided as to verse form as follows: The couplet, one introductory couplet to one poem; the five-line stanza, twelve poems; the six-line

67 See Appendix for a grouping of the poems according to their verse form.
stanzas, sixteen poems; the seven-line stanza, two poems; the nine-line stanza, four poems; the ten-line stanza, five poems; the eleven-line stanza, two poems; the twelve-line stanza, four poems; the thirteen-line stanza, two poems; the fourteen-line stanza, four poems; the fifteen-line stanza, two poems; the sixteen-line stanza, one poem; the seventeen-line stanza, one poem.

The unusual length of some of these stanzas at once excites curiosity as to whether Riley has invented new stanzaic forms. There is nothing however, to mark them as distinctly new types. One poem only of the four containing stanzas of fourteen lines, is a sonnet. This is A Bare-foot Boy. While in thought it does not contain the conventional division into the octave and sextette, the entire fourteen lines being given to a description with only a a slight suggestion of reflection upon the picture in the twelfth and thirteenth lines.

The one "drama", if such it may be called, The Rivals, is merely a one-scene dialogue, although the exceedingly slight "plot" is suggestive of a very realistic scene.

Riley is very fond of the couplet rhyme, although he has not divided any of these poems into couplets. There is couplet rhyme, however, in sixty-five of them.

Riley's diction is that of the common people. His words are antly fitted to the ideas and the emotions which he expresses; and these ideas and emotions are such as are in the minds and hearts of the great majority of the population of the middle western United States — ideas and emotions arising out of a love of home and homely things, out of a delight in nature and an out-of-door life out of a social order in which the "neighborhood" is a distinct division of the population. Yet when this has been said there remains to be accounted for in Riley's verse a large body of words, figures and images, suggestive and imaginative in the highest poetic sense, which are not in the language of the people about whom Riley has written. No other fact so conclusively proves Mr. Riley to be simply a genre poet. But the poems best illustrating this are not among his child poems, and therefore I merely refer the reader to some of them. Although they are numerous, the best examples are Afterwhiles, The Beautiful City, Herr Weiser, The Dead Lover, Away and Her Hair.

Among the child poems not in dialect the diction is not dissimilar to that of most of Riley's other non-dialectic poetry. The two noteworthy things about it are the suggestive, imaginative words and the striking, beautiful figures. These two elements are so closely related to each other that I shall treat them together, for in most cases the beautiful figures are made with the choice of suggestive words. It is in the lyric poems with an idyllic touch that we find the most beautiful figures and the finest choice of words.

In Little Girly-Girl the poet is "dreaming" of a little girl with

"Laughing eyes of limpid blue -
Treasures glimmering and gleaming
Like glad waters, running over Shelving shallows, rimmed with clover."

He speaks of her name as having come to him

"Down the brink of brooks that brought it Out of Paradise - and we -
Love and I - we leaning, caught it
From the ripples romping nigh us
And the bubbles bumping by us."

In the Proem to A Child-World the poet speaks of such "enchantedments tangible"

as

"The under-brink
Of dawns that launched the aight
Up seas of gold."

"The liquid, dripping songs of orchard-birds

With lucent deeps of silence afterwards."

In The Book of Joyous Children he describes the scenes and haunts of childhood in such suggestive lines as "the vine

Bowery groves of shady, shiny

Haunts of childish days."

Of the children, themselves, he speaks of "The young brows, wreathed, all unsought,

With apple-blossom garlands

Of the poets of those far lands

Whence all dreams are drawn."

and of them with

"The hot honey on your lip

Of the sun-smit wild strawberry

Or the chill tart of the cherry."

Taken out of their context all of these figures seem overdrawn, affected and some of them some near being meaningless. This is due to the fact that these lyric poems appeal largely to the imagination through the sense of hearing. The poems are designed to create an "atmosphere" rather than to present an idea or to appeal to any specific emotion. This creation of an atmosphere is a difficult accomplishment and where poets have succeeded in it we find some of their best poetry. A noted example is seen in Tennyson's "Lady of Shalott."

This use of striking figures is so prominent in many of the child poems that I give the following examples, which speak for themselves.

From A Country Pathway: 71

"A puritanic quiet here reviles
The almost whispered warble from the hedge
And takes a loquac's rasping voice and files
The silence to an edge.";

from Friday Afternoon, where the poet sneaks of the quiet of the closing hour of school,

"As though the day were kneeling
With the twilight for the prayer.";

from Babyhood,

72 Ibid., I, 92.
"Turn to the brook where the honeysuckle tipping O'er its vase of perfume spills it on the breeze."

A crude figure, yet one which seems fitted to the unconventional picture of the poem is found in A Barefoot Boy, where after giving a realistic picture of the boy the poet humorously ends it all with mention of "His toe stubbed—ay, his big toe-nail knocked back Like unto the clasp of an old pocket book."

Riley being a native of Indiana, he has first-hand knowledge of the Hoosier dialect. As a child he himself must have used this dialect with its idiomatic expressions, its mispronounced words, and its elision of all difficult syllables.
In his poems he does not exaggerate this dialect but speaks in the language which may be heard today in the rural districts of central and southern Indiana.

The dialect of the child poems however is not distinctly or solely a Hoosier dialect. Chil-

74 For Mr. Riley's own statement regarding child dialect in poetry see above
dren everywhere use a language which is ungrammatical and their pronunciation is of course imperfect. Yet even in the child dialect of the Hoosier State there are characteristics peculiar to it alone. These are for the most part peculiarities of pronunciation and may be seen in any of the child poems in dialect. The poet is master of this child language in practically every poem in which he uses it. He is invariably true to both the inner nature of the child and the expression of this nature in acts and speech. He seems to have possessed a native facility in the use of this dialect, for as early as 1877, when he wrote the second poem in child dialect which has been preserved in his collected works, there are no false notes in the presentation of the child.

In this poem - Prior to Miss Belle's Appearance - we find such mispronunciations for the only exception to this which I have found see above quotation from Johnson's Boy.

75 Biograph\(\text{\textcopyright}\)al Edition, I, 175.
and incorrect forms as these: "fer" for for; "'at" for that; "ketched" for caught; "th'uther" for the other; "didn' you"? for didn't you?; "gived" for gave; "chawk'lut" for chocolate; "b'uther" for brother; "a-mostest" for the most; we "whips" for we whip; "bime-by" for by and by; "nen" for and then; "don't" she for doesn't she; "ag'in" for again; "p'misise" for promise; "I'm got the nurstiest name" for I have the prettiest name; "N'our" for and then our; "Nain't" for and there isn't; "is they" for is there; "ef" for if; "wuz" for was; "childern" for children; "yer" for your; "good-un" for good one; "puddun" for pudding; "poller" for parlor; "planer" for piano; "sits" for gets; "'leven" for eleven; "'at'a mucher 'an I" for that is more than I am; "nere'as" for and there is; "you has" for you have; "ever'thing" for everything.
An added list of such expressions without reference to the poems from which they are taken will serve to illustrate still further the Hoosier child dialect. This list includes practically all of the most noteworthy peculiarities of this dialect as used by Riley in his child poems: "goed" for went; "fetch" for bring; "giggle-un" for giggling; "ist" for just; "ac' for act; "ruther" for rather; "fat's" for that is; "that-un" for that one; "ketched" for caught; "buyed" for bought; "turnt" for turned; "scoored" for scared used passively in the sense of "afraid;" "afeard" for afraid; "spunky" for angry; "skooted" for scurried; "he's go to be" for he is going to be; "a-slingin" for throwing; "they's ist" for there is only; "shurries" for cherries; "'tuz" for it was; "vittuls" for victuals; "keerful" for careful; "et for ate."
Part IV.

The Sociology of the Child Poems.

The children of Riley's poetry are individual children, not types. They are real children, not made artificial by the imposition of conventionalities upon them. Hence they reveal their instinctive traits and are moved by their natural emotions. This same simple naturalness marks also the man Riley, as he speaks of the child, either directly from his own memory or when he impersonates some other adult.

The first thing to be noted about the children of these poems is that they are home-keeping children. Their "child-world" is the neighborhood. Take them away from this neighborhood and their spirits would droop and their charm would be gone. Though it is not a child poem, Griggaby's Station represents the "home-keeping hearts" of Riley's children as well of all his other characters. The speaker in the poem longs to return from the city, where the family has gone to live after "Papa's got his patent right," to the little town of Griggsby's Station."

"Back where we used to be so happy and so pore!"

It is the homelike simplicity of the life of a rural neighborhood that holds Riley as a man and that gives the setting which is the charm of so much of his poetry. The speaker in Griggsby's Station continues:

"What's in all this grand life and high situation
And nary pink nor hollyhawk a-bloomin' at the door? —
Let's go a-visitin' back to Griggsby's Station —
Back where we used to be so happy and so pore!"

In the neighborhood, then, what place does the child have — what are his relations to the other persons in the neighborhood and to all of the institutions of the neighborhood, the home, the school, the church, the civil author—— ities, the industries and the whole community? In general we find the child a free agent, subject to parental control, but not under much restraint. The simple conditions surrounding him do not demand any complex social laws as to his rights or obligations. He is a member of a simple social order, in which right and wrong are easily distinguishable and he falls naturally, therefore, into his place; in general easily following the path of right and avoiding the path of wrong.

With regard to the child's relation to the parents, Riley deals for the most part, with the fundamental relationship of the instinctive love of each for the other. The relationship between the father and the child Riley touches upon very little, but the relation of the mother and the child is a favorite subject with him. In A Boy's Mother Riley makes the child say

"And when my Pa comes home to tea,
She loves him most as much as me.

She laughs and tells him all I said,
And grabs me up and pats my head;
An' I hug her, an' hug my Pa
An' love him purty nigh as much as Ma."

But some of Riley's very finest poetic touches are found in the poems dealing with the child's relation to the mother. In When Mother Combed My Hair the poet express-ea some of the tenderest sentiments in their relationship. The speaker, a man, says,

"I long to be
Again the boy on bended knee,
With head a-bow, and drowsy smile
Hid in a mother's lap the while,
With tender touch and kindly care,
She bends above and combs my hair."

The child's trust in the mother is a prominent note in these poems. In A Mother Song each stanza ends with a line expressive of this trust:

"Sleep, for thy mother bends over thee yet."

Evensong is another poem expressing this same thing.

The older boys in these child poems when speaking in their dialect ordinarily use the terms "Pa" and "Ma" but when they are influenced by their tenderer feelings toward their mothers they drop the Ma and use Mother. The little girls in these poems, however, use the word "mommy" for mother. In The Twins the word "Dad" is used by the boy who is speaking. In the memory poems, Riley always uses the words, father and mother.

The simple home life of a little country town is a dear memory with Riley and his love for it is genuine. He, therefore, portrays the children in his poems as delighting in the home and all simple home scenes and homely things. The child in Little Orphant Annie relates in detail the household duties of the "hired girl," but is especially interested in the scene about the kitchen fire after supper, when they have "the mostest fun A-list'inin' to the witch-tales 'at Annie tells about."

It is evident from this poem that the moral training of children was not neglected in their homes. Even the "hired girl" inculcates the principles of truthfulness, respect and obedience to parents by her "witch-tales."

The child's love of home is not due solely, however, to the simplicity of the home. Perhaps it would be more nearly the truth to say that Riley's greatest interest is not in the simplicity of the home, but in the atmosphere of the simple home which provided few artificial aids to the child's mental growth, but provided abundance of means to the free exercise of his imagination. In The Happy Little Cripple after "Aunty" has made the little home cozy for the night, she sits by the little cripple’s bed and tells the boy stories about The Good Man, and elves and enchanters until he goes to sleep with high thoughts in his mind about his angel-mother, about whom this good aunt always reminds him.

In The Raggedy Man, while the boy seems to delight in the practical things which the Raggedy Man does about the house, his greatest interest is in the imaginative story-telling qualities of the hired man and in his pretending to be various personages such as a bear-hunter, an explorer of caves in the haymow and of the
"Castul-halls" of the old barn.

Perhaps the most delightful and realistic of home-scenes in any of the poems, is that pictures by the little boy in A Defective Santa Claus. It is the story of a Christmas eve when Uncle Sidney comes to stay with the wife and children while the father goes away for the night. His going away however is only a pretense, for he returns in the evening dressed as Santa Claus, to the delight of the children. The mere story gives no idea of the poem, the charm of which is in the scene portrayed of Uncle Sidney's entertainment of the children with cracking of nuts, popping of corn, baking of potatoes in the ashes, and the telling of tales of wonder and of humor.

There are no poems among these poems of childhood which reveal at first hand the relationship between the boy and the neighborhood. In all of them however, Riley places the boy in the midst of the life of the town and countryside, where he wanders at will or almost at will, free from much social restraint. In Kingry's Mill the boys are represented as breaking some natural social laws, knowing they are breaking them but not showing much fear.

The boys take the shortest route to the river, going through and trampling down the wheat. Arrived at the river, they steal the skiff, an offense which their own imagination made much greater than it really was. (They probably desired it to be greater). After this offense the boys go to the mill, where the old miller.

"That old chap, with all his cheer, -
... . . . . . . . . . . . . . .
Swappin' lies, and pokin' fun, lets them run about the mill and play in the bins of wheat.

The boys of the these poems are acquainted with the entire neighborhood, but Riley puts the emphasis upon their acquaintance with the physical aspects of the neighborhood rather than with the persons of the neighborhood. The boys know all the barns, orchards, streams, trees, birds and flowers. The charm of many of the poems comes from the poet's skillful harmonizing of the boy with his natural surroundings.

In several poems, however, there are references to visits of the boys to the neighboring homes and the boys seem to take a great delight in these visits. Yet it is the journey that delights them rather than the visit itself. The School Boy's Favorite shows this characteristic. Here the chorus, from a poem in an old school reader, shows the boy's greatest interest divided between the journey and the visits:

"Over the river and through the wood
Now Grandmother's cap I spy:
Hurrah for the fun! Is the pudding done?
Hurrah for the pumpkin-pie!"

In Little Cousin Jasper is the recorded visit by a little boy to another little boy. Here the boy who is visited is the speaker. His interest in the visit arises from the wonderful stories which the little visitor tells of his home town. The wanderlust and the romance in the speaker are aroused and he says:

"Wish our town ain't like it is! Wish it's isn't as big as his! Wish they'd move here, And we'd move to Rensselaer!"

This same love of new scenes and "romantic" interests is shown by the little boy in Goin' to the Fair. The roads full of vehicles, the fair with its flags and tents, and merry-go-round and balloon, satisfy to the full the boy's romantic nature.

School life plays only a small part in Riley's poems. The poet was only an irregular attendant upon school and his school life closed before he was sixteen years of age. In the only poem entirely upon the subject of school, Friday Afternoon, Riley picks upon the "Exercises" of "Friday Afternoon"

as (evidently) the most interesting thing about school from the standpoint of the boy.

In another poem "Hik-tee Dick," Riley tells of two boys, Billy and Buddy, who make so much trouble for the teacher that she finally, after one of their pranks, looks them in her desk and thus:

"Closed the incident so - yes and locked it she did."

Another poem worthy of mention in this brief account of the sociology of Riley's child poem is "A Little Lame Boy's Views." It shows the kindliness of the world (however thoughtless the world may be in other ways) toward a little crippled child. The poem is full of pathos, but cheering withal and it helps one to realize the native kindliness of the majority of people.

The little speaker in the poem says:

"On 'Soursion-day-an' Shows - an' Fairs -
They ain't no bad folks anywhere! - "

He then goes on to show how the people on the street cars give him a seat, how the careless mob is careful not to "crowd" him, how the ticket-seller gives him too much change, how the country folks give him something to eat from their lunches at the fair and how all the world is kind, so kind that the little fellow says,

"Folks all's so good to me that I—Sometimes— I nearly purt' near' cry. "
APPENDIX

A Grouping of the Child Poems on the Basis of Stanza Form.

Verse Form of the Poems.

I Rhymed Poems

Couplet

4-line stanza - 41 poems.

Babyhood,
Ballad, A Bae-Bae, The Best Times, The single stanza, Boy's Mother, A couplet rhyme,
Bub Says

Christmas Afterthought, couplet rhyme, single stanza, Chimactic Sorcery, couplet rhyme,
Company Manners, couplet rhyme, single stanza,
Country Pathway, A

Dolly's Mother, The Dubious "Old Kris" a couplet rhyme,

Exceeding All, single stanza,
Extremes, couplet rhyme,

Find the Favorite Fishing Party, The couplet rhyme,

God Bless Us Every One
Home Again couplet rhyme, single stanza,
Honey Dripping from the Comb

In Fervent Praise of Picnics couplet rhyme, single stanza, Intellectual Limitations

Little Cousin Jasper couplet rhyme,
Little Johnnie's Christmas,
Little Mandy's Christmas Tree couplet rhyme, Lovely Child, The couplet rhyme,

Max and Jim couplet rhyme,
My Father's Hall couplet rhyme,

Old Haymow, The couplet rhyme, Old Tramp, The

Ponchoa Pilot couplet rhyme,
Prospective Glimpse, A couplet rhyme,

Rider of the Knee couplet rhyme,
Runaway Boy couplet rhyme,

Some Scattering Remarks of Bub's couplet rhyme, Slumber Song

"This Dear Child-Hearted Woman That is Dead,"
To a Boy Whistling
Truly Marvelous, The couplet rhyme, single stanza, Twins, The couplet rhyme,

Uncle Sidney

Youthful Patriot, The couplet rhyme, single stanza,
5-line Stanza.

Boys, The

Elmer Brown, couplet rhyme, Empty Nest, An Fool Younghens

King of 00 R insect-Jing, The

Lisper, The Mother-Song, A

Phantom, A

Proem to a Child-World

Tommy Smith, couplet rhyme,

"She Dispalins It"

Squirt-Gun Uncle Maked Me, The

6-line Stanza

Billy and His Drum

Boys' Candidate, The

Bub Says partly couplet rhyme,

Days Gone By, The couplet rhyme,

Dream of the Little Princess, The Go Read Your Book

Katydid, The

Lugubrious Whing-Whank, The

Nine Little Goblins

Out to Old Aunt Mary's partly couplet rhyme,

Penalty of Genius, The Red Riding Hood

"Squirrel and the Funi Little Girl, The" (See"Lisp-Stepmother, The

ing in numbers)

Through Sleepy-Land

Want to Be Whur: Mother Is
7 -line Stanza

Life Lesson, A
Old Granny Dusk

8 -line Stanza

Almost Beyond Endurance
As I Sit in the Silence

Baby, The Billy Miller's Circus Show
Book of Joyous Children, The Boy Lives on Our Farm, The Boy Patriot, The

Down Around the River   couplet rhyme
Dream of Long Ago, A

Folks at Lonesomeville
"Friday Afternoon"
Funniest Think in the World, The

Goin to the Fair   couplet rhyme,
Goldie Goodwin   couplet rhyme single stanza,
Granny
Guiney Pigs   couplet rhyme,

Happy Little Cripple, The Her Poet-Brother
"Hit-tee Dik"
Hunter Boy, The

Impetuous Resolve, An Impromptu Fairy-Tale, An
In the Night
Iry and Billy and Jo

Jaybird, The Johnson's Boy

Kinky's Mill   couplet rhyme,
Lincoln, The Boy
Little Girly-Girl
Little Lame Boy's Views, A Little Marjorie couplet rhyme,
Little Orphant Annie Lost Kiss, The

Mulberry Tree, The

Naughty Claude
Noble Old Elm, The
No Boy Knows couplet rhyme,

Old Man's Memory, An Old Man Whiskery-Whee-Kum: Wheeze couplet rhyme, Old Swimmin'-Hole, The
Old Times Were the Best, The
Old Trundle-Bed, The

Parental Christmas Presents single stanza,
Pet Coon, The

School-Boys' Favorite, The Song (Some Songs After Master Singers)
Song of Singing Strength of the Weak, The

Thomas the Pretender
Toy-Balloon, The

Uncle Sidney's Logic single stanza,
Up and Down Old Brandywine Used-to-be, The

When Mother Combed My Hair couplet rhyme,
When our Baby Died,
When the World Busts Through When Uncle Doo Was Young
When We First Played Show
13-line Stanza
"Little Man in the Tin Shop, The Spoiled Child, The

14-line Stanza
All Golden, the  couplet rhyme,
Barefoot Boy,  sonnet,
Mongst the Hills of Somerset  couplet rhyme,
Young Old Man, The  couplet rhyme.

15-line Stanza
Little Coat, The  couplet rhyme,
Our Hired Girl

16-line Stanza
Hoosier Folk Child, The  couplet rhyme,

17-line Stanza
Little Mook Man, The

Strophe
Bear Family, The  couplet rhyme,
Born to the Purple  couplet rhyme,
Bumble Bee, The  couplet rhyme

Child's Home Long Ago, A  couplet rhyme, Child-World, A  couplet rhyme,

Defective Santa Claus, A  couplet rhyme,

His Pa's Romance
Home-Folks

In Swimming Time

Jack the Giant-Killer  couplet rhyme,
Little Dick and the Clock
Little Jack Janitor  couplet rhyme,
Out Boyhood Haunts

Rabbits

Song O' Cheer, A

That-air Young-un
Thinkin' Back
To the Child Julia Toy Penny-Dog, The

Drama

Rivals, The

Stanzas of various length

Bub Says
Christmas Memory, The Guatatory Achievement, A Little-Girl-Two-Little-Girls
My Conscience

II: Unrhymed Poems (Blank Verse)

Bear Story, The Bud's Fairy Tale
Maymie's Story of Red Riding Hood.
GENERAL INDEX.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page(s)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Adventure in Riley's Child Poems</td>
<td>31, 44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Afterwhiles:</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Alex&quot;</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angel, The</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>As I Sit in the Silence</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At Aunty's House</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At Noey's House</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Away</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Babyhood</td>
<td>67, 72, 96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Backward Look, A</td>
<td>64, 78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barefoot Boy, A</td>
<td>91, 97</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bear Story, The</td>
<td>16, 37, 40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beautiful City, The</td>
<td>11, 56, 93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Blake, William</td>
<td>10, 50, 62, 81, 89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Book of Joyous Children, The</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boyhood</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boys and Girls of Riley's Poems</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boy's Mother, A</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Browning, Robert</td>
<td>56, 88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bryant, William Cullen</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Bud&quot;</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bud's Fairy Tale</td>
<td>37, 42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burns, Robert</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Charley</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child Heart, The</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child World, A</td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child World, The</td>
<td>23, 36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christmas Memory, A</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christmas Poems</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Classification of Dialect Poems</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Country Pathway, A</td>
<td>67, 70, 78, 96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cousin Rufus</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Days Gone By, The</td>
<td>74, 85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dead Lover, The</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Defective Santa Claus, A</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dialect</td>
<td>3, 97</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Subject</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dialect, Riley On</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Diction</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don Quixote</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dramatic Element in Riley</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Even-song</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Faculty Divine, The</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fairy Paradise, A</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Father</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Feminine Element in Riley's Child Poems</td>
<td>39, 55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fishing Party, The</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flowers</td>
<td>72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Forests</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Friday Afternoon</td>
<td>96, 111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Give Me the Baby</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Goin' to the Fair</td>
<td>111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Griggfield, Indiana</td>
<td>1, 23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Griggaby's Station</td>
<td>101</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guiney Pigs</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Happy Little Cripple, The</td>
<td>57, 106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heaven, A child's feeling for</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Her Hair</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Her Poet Brother</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herr Weiser</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Highways</td>
<td>68, 69, 70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hio-tee-Dik</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hired Man and Floretty, The</td>
<td>3, 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Home, The child's feeling for</td>
<td>34, 35, 36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Honey Dripping form the Comb</td>
<td>66, 71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hoodlum, Miss</td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hoosier Children</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>House, The in Riley's poetry</td>
<td>24, 78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Howells, W. D.</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Idealized Child, The</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Impeetuous Resolve, An</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Indianapolia</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title</td>
<td>Page Numbers</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>--------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In Swimming Time</td>
<td>71, 72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jack, The Giant Killer</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Johnson's Boy</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Johnny&quot;</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Keats, John</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kingry's Mill</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lady of Shalott, The</td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lincoln--Abraham</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Cousin Jasper</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Girly-Girl</td>
<td>75, 83, 94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little-Girl-Two-Little Girls</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Johnt's Christmas</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Lame Boy's Views, A</td>
<td>51, 112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Mandy's Christmas Tree</td>
<td>48, 49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Little Orphant Annie</td>
<td>16, 59, 105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Lizabuth Ann on Bakin Day</td>
<td>59, 61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lizzie</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Loehrs and the Hammonds, The</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maymie's Story of Red Riding Hood</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Melancholy in Riley's Poems</td>
<td>1, 69, 80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milton, John</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mind of the Child, The Keen</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Morality in Riley's Poetry</td>
<td>30, 52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother</td>
<td>76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother Goose</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother, Riley's tribute to his</td>
<td>26, 27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mother Song, A</td>
<td>76, 77, 80, 83, 104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Road, The</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nature, Riley's interest in elemental</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Noey</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Noted Traveler, The</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nothin' to Say</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Number of Child Poems</td>
<td>12, 13</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Ode on Immortality, Wordsworth  50
Old Home Folks, The  26, 29, 75
Old Swimmin' Hole, The  73, 84
Old Times Were the Best, The  66
Old Trundle Bed, The  73, 75, 77
"Ole Bumblebore"
Orchard, The  18
Our Boyhood Haunts  79
Our Hired Girl  87, 89
Out to Old Aunt Mary's  2, 3, 70, 71, 78

Pan  68
Parents  5, 103
Pathos  16, 17, 31, 45
Paths  68, 69, 70
Pet Coon, The  58
Philosophy of Riley  10, 65
Pos, Edgar Allen  65, 83
Prelude, The Wordsworth  26
Prior to Miss Belle's Appearance  16, 98

Raggedy Man, The  3, 59, 107
Rain  74
Real Child in Literature, The  4
Riley, J. W.  1
Riley, John A.  21
Riley on Dialect  3
Roads  68, 69, 70
Robin Hood  31
Romanticists  62
Runaway Boy  20

Schoolboy's Favorite, The  110
Sense Perception in Riley  28
Sensitiveness of the Child  9, 49
Sociology  101
Spoiled Child, The  53
Squidjiicum  43
Squirt Gun Uncle Maked Me, The  58
Stadman, E. C.  83
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Tennyson</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thinkin' Back</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>To a Boy Whistling</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tommy Smith</td>
<td>75, 80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>To the Mother</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Town Boy, Interests of Tommy Smith</td>
<td>2, 3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Twins, The</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uncle Mart</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uncle Sidney</td>
<td>3, 53, 58, 108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Up and Down Old Brandywine</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Used-to-be, The</td>
<td>68, 74, 82</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Verse Form of Riley's Child Poems</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Want to Be Whur Mother Is</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Watts, Isaac</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Way the Baby Slept, The</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>We are Seven</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>When Mother Combed My Hair</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>When Our Baby Died</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whittier, John G.</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Willie</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wind</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wordsworth,</td>
<td>10, 14, 15, 27, 50, 85, 88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Youthful Patriot, The</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>